MR. LAING said, he rose to correct the misapprehension into which the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) had fallen in respect to the argument which he had used on Friday night. He did not on that occasion contend that this loan should have been raised by terminable annuities only. The great object which he had then urged against the Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme was founded on the creation of so large an amount of debt in the ordinary 3 per cent. Consolidated Stock, and he had simply represented that it would have been possible for the right hon. Gentleman to have raised an equally large amount either by a system of terminable annuities, or by the creation of stock at the market rate of interest which the Government credit would have commanded at the time, viz., at 3½ per cent. Another very serious objection which he felt to the right hon. Gentleman's proposition was, that as the Three per cents were, to a great degree, the barometer which regulated the state of our national credit, owing to there being always a large amount of trust and other moneys of the same description ready to be invested in them, the result of adding so largely to this description of stock would be to make the other securities range at a lower rate than they otherwise would do. Had not the price of Consols been unnecessarily depressed by the sale of savings' bank stock, and had the loan been proposed in some other description of stock, Consols would, he had every reason to believe, have stood some 3 per cent. higher than they did at the present time. But a fall of one per cent. in the price of

Consols was equivalent to a diminution of about 10,000,000*l.* in the value of the whole national securities, and a scheme which, for the sake of getting only 16,000,000*l.*, caused even a temporary diminution in the aggregate value of the national property to the amount of some 25,000,000*l.*, could not be a very good one. Except in case of great urgency any addition to the Three per Cents ought to be avoided. In his opinion, it would have been practicable for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have resorted to the plan of terminable annuities, and it was for the purpose of showing that they were quite as marketable as any other description of security that he had on Friday quoted the case of the French railways, where there was somewhere about 100,000,000*l.* of property invested entirely in terminating stock. It was a mere question of price, and, though no doubt a considerable present sacrifice would be inevitable, yet now that we were in all probability at the commencement of a new series of loans, it was well worth trying whether they could not be advantageously effected in terminable stock. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might easily have ascertained from the great moneyed corporations at what price they would effect such a loan; and, if the sacrifice had appeared too great, he would then have had the other alternative open to him of effecting it in Three-and-a-half per Cents, by which means, though no actual reduction of debt was secured, yet there would have been a prospect of effecting at some future period a reduction in the interest. The hon. Member for Huntingdon had evidently misunderstood the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn). The right hon. Gentleman did not object to the principle of attempting to reduce the debt, but to a mode of doing so which he considered would be entirely illusory. If the Government were in earnest, let them embody this principle in the very terms and essence of the loan, and then the performance of the obligation so imposed could not be shirked from without their committing an act equivalent to national bankruptcy. They certainly ought not to burden posterity with a perpetual charge of this description; but he (Mr. Laing) could not be a party to the creation of a mere fictitious guarantee for the repayment of this loan, which, when it came to be tested, would not hold water.

MR. JAMES MACGREGOR said, that the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs (Mr. Laing) had quoted as a parallel to this loan the raising of a large sum of money on the French railways, upon which 100,000,000*l.* were borrowed in what the hon. Member called terminable annuities. Now, the fact was, that the profits on the French railways were so large that they enabled a considerable sum to be regularly laid by for what was termed an amortissement of the capital, by which means the parties who subscribed the 100,000,000*l.* received back again, on the expiration of the lease, the whole amount of the capital they had previously invested. It would be well for the unfortunate holders of railway property in England if they could receive back their original capital. With regard to the contract which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had entered into for this loan, it was only fair to say that, in the difficulty in which he had been placed in having to borrow 16,000,000*l.* concurrently with the imposition of additional taxes, the right hon. gentleman had conducted the operation in a highly satisfactory manner, and that its execution reflected upon him the greatest credit.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he had heard with much astonishment the objection stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) to that House, pledging itself to the redemption, at a future time, of the loan now to be raised. Why, that was precisely the same course which that right hon. Gentleman himself pursued last year when he raised a certain sum upon Exchequer Bonds, and asked the House to agree to a certain amount of taxation to afford him the means at a subsequent period of redeeming those bonds. Thus the House was involved in a pledge to maintain a certain amount of taxation to enable it to fulfil the engagement into which it had entered; and it was no more than what the present Chancellor of the Exchequer asked them to do in regard to the repayment of this loan. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) in thinking that although no doubt a future House of Commons might reverse the decision to which they came on the present occasion, yet that it was not inconsistent with their duty to give the best pledge in their power for the honesty of their intention, when peace should happily be restored, to maintain such an amount of taxation as would admit of the gradual reduction of the national debt to the point at which it stood before the contraction of this loan.

MR. WILKINSON said, he doubted the wisdom of the House now entering into a pledge to be fulfilled hereafter, when the circumstances of the country might be altered in a manner which it was utterly impossible for anybody now to foresee. With regard to the creation of a 3½ per cent. stock, as suggested by the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing), that course, in the present state of monetary affairs, would not, he considered, have been expedient.

MR. CARDWELL said, that he had heard with some surprise the remarks of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. T. Hankey), for if two things were perfectly distinct they were these : one for the House of Commons to do a thing at a particular time, and the other for them to enter into vague paper promises which they themselves had no power to perform. Besides, the case referred to by the hon. Member was otherwise different from the present loan. When the Exchequer Bonds were issued, the condition for repayment within a certain period was a stipulation entered into with the lenders—it was part of the contract, and was not therefore likely to be broken. The taxes, therefore, imposed to meet it were sure to be maintained. But what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn) contended was, that this clause would not constitute any obligation on the public ; that it would merely act as an opiate, inducing them to believe that this was a mere temporary loan, and that provision had been made for its repayment in time of peace, although at the same time we knew that, except in the formal words of an Act of Parliament, no such provision had been made, because it was not in our power to make any. The hon. Member for the Wick Burghs (Mr. Laing) said that the borrowing of money on terminable annuities was a question of price. No doubt it was. And it was the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pursue the requisite calculations on matters of price, and to take care that the loan was negotiated on as favourable terms for the public as possible. He believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done so on the present occasion, and that the present loan was negotiated in a manner highly advantageous to the public. As to the expediency of borrowing upon loans terminable on shorter notice than a twelve-month—in doing so they obtained a substantial return for any additional price they paid to the lender, because it was well known that the condition of giving twelve months' notice presented a serious practical obstacle to the operation of reducing the interest on the debt. It was no sufficient answer to this to say that those loans, the interest of which could be lowered on a shorter notice, were already large in amount ; for it was obvious that the greater the proportion of debt over which they could spread a reduced rate of interest, the better would it be for the public.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : I have, Sir, listened with the utmost respect to the remarks made by my right hon. Friends the Members for the two Universities on the proposal contained in the resolution before the House with respect to the annual repayment of the loan after the expiration of the war. The opinions which they have expressed will command great weight, not only from their financial experience, but from their ability in all matters relating to this branch of the subject. Sir, I fully admit that the Resolution in question is not a matter of contract between the Government and the lenders of the 16,000,000*l.*, and that it is perfectly open to this House to consider this question without placing any limit on the discussion, and to deal with the clause, when the Bill is before them, as they may think fit. But this proposition has been deliberately proposed to the House by the Government, as they believe it to be a proper and defensible proposition, and when the proper time comes they will feel it their duty to adhere to, and to take the sense of the House upon it. I cannot but think that there has been some misapprehension on the part of my two right hon. Friends as to the precise effect of the proposition in question. On Friday night, when I had the honour of explaining its nature, what I distinctly stated was, that this House could not make an irrevocable law ; that an Act passed by this Parliament might be repealed by a Parliament fifteen years hence ; and that we could not do anything which would effectually tie up the hands of our successors. Precisely the same objection that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goulburn) makes to this proposition might be made to every Act which passes this House which affects future generations. There is nothing peculiar in the proposition which we make. It cannot control the future discretion of Parliament; but the effect which it would have if it received the authority of law is this—it creates a permanent charge on the Consolidated Fund, and it becomes the duty of the existing Government to make provision for that sum out of the Ways and Means of the year. It will, therefore, be the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so long as this Act remains unrepealed, to estimate for 1,000,000*l.* in his annual Budget for the purpose of repaying the loan now contracted. I am perfectly aware that it may so happen that the nation may be engaged in war, or that there may be some pressing necessity which may render it inexpedient that the surplus revenue of a particular year should be applied to the reduction of this debt; if so, it will be in the power of Parliament to untie the hands of the Government, and to repeal, either permanently or temporarily, the enactment which makes it necessary that the Government should provide this 1,000,000*l.*, and to make any provision which they may deem suited to the exigencies of the time; but until Parliament does so interfere, and does so untie the hands of the Government, it will have to make this provision for the extinction of the debt. This is all that it is possible for us to do, for we can in no way place a limit on the future discretion of Parliament. We are unwilling to create a permanent burden on posterity, and circumstances prevent us from borrowing so large a sum as the loan required in terminable annuities. It has been stated by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), who is entitled to speak with great authority on this subject—and I am satisfied that his statement will be confirmed by all persons who will carefully consider the question—that a loan of 16,000,000*l.* cannot be effected on terminable annuities without giving terms so extravagant that the Government would be justly condemned if it agreed to accept them. I question whether, without giving terms absolutely extravagant, so large a loan could be effected at all in terminable annuities of thirty years, for there is a great objection on the part of the public to receive back every year a portion of their capital in dribbles, subjecting them to the necessity of expending their capital as income, or of reinvesting it in a troublesome manner in small sums, very often under embarrassing circumstances. These would be difficulties so great that it is very questionable whether so large a loan could be effected at all in terminable annuities. As it was not, therefore, in the power of the Government to effect the loan in terminable annuities, they have gone as far as they believed they possibly could—they have raised a portion in perpetual stock, and they propose at the same time to make it obligatory on the existing Government to apply for 1,000,000*l.* annually to extinguish the debt so created. I am willing to admit that this is not a paramount authority, and that Parliament has the power to rescind it; but it is impossible for us, without making the repayment of the debt matter of specific contract between the Government and the lenders, to impose more stringent obligations. With regard to terminable annuities, there is this advantage—the repayment of the principal and interest is made a matter of specific contract between the Government and the lenders; but with regard to perpetual annuities this is not and cannot be the case. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge made some remarks as to the expediency of contracting for this loan in 3 per cent Reduced Annuities rather than in Consols, on the ground that the one was redeemable by a year's notice, which, with regard to the other stock, was not the case. He spoke of Consols as being irredeemable; but I cannot help thinking that he confounded two ideas which are wholly different—namely, the reduction of interest on stock and the extinction of that stock; for, if the House should at any time be induced, as I hope it will be, to make a real sinking fund, and not an imaginary and illusory one, founded on the principle of borrowing and the principle of compound interest, I see no reason why Consols or any perpetual annuity should not be redeemed by the Government going into the market and buying up their own annuities, thus extinguishing both debt and interest. I confess I am not very sanguine as to the possibility of reducing—within the lifetime of the present generation—the interest on Three per Cent Stock, but I see no reason why we may not extinguish any amount of stock by annually applying to the purchase of it surplus taxation. My right hon. Friend seemed to speak of perpetual annuities as though they were inextinguishable, and he seemed to contrast terminable annuities as something the Government can extinguish with perpetual annuities, as something which the provision, because it would enable the Government to buy up not only Three per Cent Consols, but any other public security, according to their discretion. The other suggestion was a very friendly one to come from a man who was not favourable to the substance of the clause. He doubted whether the clause was wide enough. The Chancellor of the Exchequer created 16,000,000*l.* Consols, and the object of the clause was to require the payment of as much money at the rate of 1,000,000*l.* per annum as would redeem 16,000,000*l.* of Consols. But Consols might be redeemed from other sources, and in five years after the conclusion of peace there might be 10,000,000*l.* of surplus in that form, so to be applied by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. If so, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not get 16,000,000*l.* paid under this clause, for the authority of this clause would cease as soon as 16,000,000*l.* worth of Consols were redeemed, whether it were redeemed by money under this clause, or by the general application of the law relative to an appropriation of a portion of the surplus revenue towards the reduction of the national debt. He doubted, therefore, whether the clause was strong enough for the object proposed.

MR. T. BARING said, he thought that the adoption of the first suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) would entirely frustrate the object of the Resolution. There was a great variety of Government securities, and the alteration suggested by the right hon. Gentleman would enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to buy up the Exchequer bonds of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) when they fell due, or to buy up Exchequer bills if it were convenient to the Government of the day to take 1,000,000*l.* of them off the market, or the deficiency bills of the savings banks might be taken off the market. The object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that, beyond any other claim upon the Exchequer, 1,000,000*l.* a year should be applied to the redemption of the Consols created by this Resolution. He could not, therefore, understand that there could be any other object in the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman than to frustrate that arrangement.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought he was hardly open to the remark, that his object was to frustrate the intention of the Resolution, and he must ask the hon. Gentleman to explain his meaning.

MR. T. BARING said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he had only intended to say that the effect, and not the object, of the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion would be that which he had described.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the alteration which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) had suggested was not to exclude Exchequer bills or Exchequer bonds or any other description of security, not Three per Cent Consols, from being redeemed under this clause. Perhaps, the House would allow him to consider the suggestion, and, if it should be found desirable to make the change pointed out, it could be done when the Bill was before the House. He certainly did not see any objection to applying the 1,000,000*l.* a year to the redemption of any portion of the funded debt. With regard to the other point referred to by his right hon. Friend, it was difficult, at the moment, to see what would be the precise effect of the suggestion he had made. It was, of course, desirable to avoid giving the words of the Resolution a wider extension than they would be strictly intended to bear; he would, therefore, consider the point adverted to by his right hon. Friend, and state his opinion respecting it on a future occasion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that notwithstanding the reply of the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), it was his belief that the 86,000,000*l.* did not include the cost of collection of the revenue. That was an important question to be considered. The object of the former Commission was to bring the whole of the expenditure, including the cost of collection, under the notice and supervision of Parliament; and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer deserved the highest credit for the good he had done in that direction. There was no necessity for the suppression of the large amount of the cost of the collection, and if it were added to the revenue accounts it would be found that the sum wanted would not be 86,000,000*l.*, but nearly 90,000,000*l.* He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the House some assurance that this subject should be attended to.

MR. WILSON said, that all the accounts relating to the expenditure for the present year had been made up according to the old system, which excluded the cost of collection on one side of the account, as well as the gross amount of revenue on the other. For the future, the accounts would show both these items.

Resolution agreed to.

On Resolution 7, relating to the increase of duty on Spirits being read,

MR. WHITESIDE said, he had to complain of the phraseology adopted in the Resolution, and which in fact involved a species of great injustice to a large body of persons connected with the spirit trade in Ireland. The words of the Resolution were that—should be subject to an additional duty. Now, the question he had to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, did he mean that after the passing of this Resolution the new duty should have a retrospective effect upon the stocks in the possession of the dealers who had already paid the existing duty? Because, if that was the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman, a more unjust thing he could not conceive. He did not find fault that the stocks which the coffee dealers and the tea dealers had in hand were to be surcharged.

"Every gallon of spirits of the strength of hydrometer proof, which on or after the 20th day of April, 1855, shall be distilled in Scotland and Ireland respectively, or be in the stock, custody, or possession of any distiller, rectifier, or compounder of, or dealer in, spirits in Scotland or Ireland"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the explanation he had to give was, that this Resolution had been drawn up on the same plan as the Resolution for a similar object relating to the increase of the spirit duty was prepared by his right hon. Friend and predecessor last year, and which was then adopted by the House. It was on that occasion declared that the stock in hand should be subject to the increased duty on the same principle that the stock in hand had the benefit in the case of a reduction of duty.

MR. FAGAN said, he must, though with great respect, beg to deny the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, that the present Resolution was prepared in similar words to those used in the Resolution of last year. The Resolution of last year did not contain the words "rectifier or compounder of, or dealer in spirits." He was aware that the additional dealer. If, therefore, the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside) would support him, he would move that the words "rectifier, or compounder of, or dealer in spirits" be expunged from the Resolution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there existed no doubt as to what was the practice in these cases with respect to the stocks of the distillers, and that the only question that arose was with respect to the stocks in the hands of the rectifiers and of the dealers in spirits. He was not prepared to say whether the practice either way had been uniform. He would take the subject into consideration, and, if the hon. Gentleman would bring the question again before the House, he would be prepared to express his final opinion upon it.

MR. FAGAN said, he was quite satisfied with the assurance the right hon. Gentleman had just given.

Resolution agreed to; as were also Resolutions 8 to 15 inclusive.

On Resolution 8 relative to the duty on sugar,

CAPTAIN LAFFAN said, that recently very considerable additions had been made to the duties on sugar in the British possessions, and at the same time very considerable remissions were made to slave-grown sugar. The present addition to the sugar duties was regarded in the Colonies generally as an injustice. The Mauritius, the Colony with which he was best acquainted, was dependent for its prosperity, and, indeed for its very existence, upon having a full supply of free labour from India. It was at first extremely difficult to persuade single men to come from India with the view of realising a competence with which to return to their own country. The agents of the Government in India acting upon, or misinterpreting, instructions received from home, made and enforced a regulation that every Indian leaving India should be accompanied by a woman, which was equivalent to stopping the supply of labour and destroying the production of sugar at Mauritius. Representations were made on the subject to Her Majesty's Government, who proceeded to consider the question, but they were taking so long a time to arrive at a determination that while the matter was being settled the Colony was being ruined. The Govern-land man would communicate to the Government agents in India that they had misinterpreted the instructions sent them.

MR. J. BALL said, it was true that the immigration into the Mauritius, as well as into other Colonies, of a large number of men, increasing enormously the male population, had engaged the attention of successive Colonial Ministers, and it was therefore deemed highly essential that effectual steps should be taken to procure an approximate proportion between the two sexes in those Colonies. In the month of June last, therefore, a letter on the subject had been addressed to the Governors of the more important Colonies, in which, however, there was not one word indicative of an intention to put an end abruptly to the introduction of coolies. No instructions were given by the Colonial Office to the emigration agents in India, but the Emigration Commissioners in this country, to whom the views of the Duke of Newcastle were made known, informed those gentlemen that it was essential that a considerable proportion of women should emigrate along with the men. From the tenor of these instructions he could not think that any officer had taken upon himself arbitrarily to put a stop to the emigration from India to the Mauritius, because there was nothing whatever in those instructions which distinguished the case of the Mauritius from other Colonies. He could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that it was the intention of the Government to forward precise instructions by the mail about to leave, and if any misconception had existed it would be removed. At the same time, the noble Lord now Secretary for the Colonies concurred entirely with those who had preceded him in thinking that immediate and effective steps should be taken to increase the female population of the sugar colonies.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, that, as a West India Proprietor who had suffered long in silence, he trusted that he might be allowed to protest in a few words against the injustice with which the West India Colonies had been treated. They had been told that in 1854 they would know the worst, and they had made their arrangements in the hope that no further prejudicial measures would be taken against them. In the very first year afterwards extra duties were imposed upon their produce—duties which, in his opinion, would ing them with loss. He had had the misfortune to succeed to a West India estate of from 2,000*l.* to 3,000*l.* a year; but for the last few years of his possession it had caused him to be 1,500*l.* a year out of pocket. He had become a free trader greatly to his own loss, and he wished to know why hon. Gentlemen opposite had forgotten on the present occasion those free trade principles which for the last ten years they had been inculcating in the Legislature. In a time of peace they had suffered severely from free trade, and he had to protest against inflicting on them in time of war a gross injustice, and a policy which would certainly ruin them.

MR. E. BALL said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was one of the strenuous advocates of free trade, and was so enamoured of that beautiful theory that he was willing to sacrifice his interest of from 2,000*l.* to 3,000*l.* a year, for which he now paid 1,500*l.* He (Mr. E. Ball) had opposed the alteration of those duties, not only on account of the loss which would be entailed on West Indian property by the alteration, but also and chiefly on account of the great impetus which would be given to the slave trade and slavery in Brazil. He wished to know whether the Government intended the increase of duty to apply to all sugars, or only to those of Cuba and Brazil. If only to Cuba and Brazil, the proposal would be an excellent one.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he did not rise to criticise the budget, but only to express his deep regret that there should be a necessity for proposing a duty on sugar, which he believed would have a pernicious effect on the happiness and comfort of the lower classes. He did not mean to deny the existence of the necessity, for he had the greatest confidence in the talents of the right hon. gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he must express his regret at a necessity which, in a moral point of view, would have most unfavourable results.

MR. WILSON said, with respect to the complaints of the hon. and gallant member for St. Ives (Captain Laffan) who appeared as the advocate of Mauritius, he had complained rather of the absence of labour than of the condition of land. With respect to the sugar colonies in general, perhaps there was no British interest which exhibited a more marked progress than the island of Mauritius. The very complaint of the want of labour was the best evidence of the prosperity which that island enjoyed. It would be satisfactory to the House to know that in 1844, when Mauritius was in the full enjoyment of a protection amounting almost to an exclusion of foreign sugar, its produce was 27,000 tons per annum. In 1848 it had risen to 44,000 tons, and in 1854, after protective duties had been reduced, the exportation had risen from that amount to 82,000 tons. There was, therefore, a large increase under the influence of free trade and of a competition which increased year by year. With such a large increase he therefore did not wonder that they complained of the want of labour in that island. The Colonial-Office would encourage emigration from India in every way consistent with other interests to supply that demand for labour. Now what he had said, with reference to the prosperity, the Mauritius might with truth be said of the whole of the sugar colonies, though perhaps not to the same extent. Taking the British colonies as a whole, he found that in 1844, when these colonies enjoyed protection, they exported 204,000 tons of sugar to this country. Last year this amount was increased to 290,000 tons. The effect of free trade had been greatly to reduce the price of sugar, and as to the proposed increase, it would only increase the price of sugar to the consumer 1s. per cwt. as compared with the price last year. It was not the intention of the Government that the increased duty should apply solely to the sugars of Cuba and Brazil, but to sugars of all descriptions.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he had the misfortune, like the hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart), to be a West Indian proprietor, and, notwithstanding all the efforts he had made to improve his property, he had found it gradually becoming less valuable since the alterations in the policy of the Government had been carried into effect. It was quite evident that the increase in the duties now proposed would chiefly fall upon the producer, and he could not believe that it would amount to less than 1s. per cwt., or 1l. per ton. Upon 160,000 tons of sugar there would consequently be a loss of 160,000*l.* a year, and could it be said that much used by the poor as tea, coffee, and sugar. It would be better to cut down the Estimates 2,000,000*l.* than to raise that amount by means so objectionable. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Wilson) was wrong if he thought that slave-grown sugar had not interfered with free-labour sugar. This country had imported from the West Indian colonies last year 1,600,000 cwt. of sugar, and from Cuba, Porto Rico, Brazil, and other slave-labour countries, 1,700,000 cwt. He believed the proposed increase of the duty would not only tax without any necessity the comforts of the poor, but would also stimulate the production of slave-grown sugar, and inflict a serious injury upon our colonial producers.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he must complain of the policy of indirect taxation, because if the demand for manufactures was restricted abroad, the means of paying the taxes in this country would be diminished. He agreed that the addition of one per cent. to the income tax, which would produce the amount, would be preferable to this proposition, and he trusted that the House would not sanction the absurdity of resorting to a principle which had over and over again been condemned.

Resolution agreed to, as were also the remaining Resolutions.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. COWAN said, he had given notice of his intention to move certain clauses and amendments, with the view of repealing the restrictions and limitations with respect to the number of sheets of paper, and the dimensions of the letter-press, whether of newspapers or periodical publications, imposed by the Acts now in force; and, also, for providing for the conveyance through the Post Office not only of newspapers, but of all printed matter, at the rate of one halfpenny for each transmission for every two ounces or portion of two ounces carried, or at such rates as would duly remunerate the Post Office for the service performed. It would perhaps be convenient to the House, therefore, if he took that opportunity of explaining the nature of the amendments he proposed to submit to the Committee. He had been for many years connected, in the way of second reading of this Bill, but he had not done so without reluctance, because he was very unwilling to sacrifice a revenue of 200,000*l.* a year in times like the present, when it was most important to husband the resources of the country. He thought, however, that when the Government did not, or at all events could not enforce the existing law, a change was imperative, and he supported the second reading of the Bill in the belief that, eventually, the revenue would not suffer to any extent, if at all, from the alteration which was proposed. He had looked through the various Acts of Parliament which for many years, up to 1825, had regulated newspaper stamps, and he thought they bore evidence of the disposition of the Legislature from the time of Queen Anne, to hamper and restrict newspaper proprietors. Previously to 1825 no newspaper could be legally published of larger dimensions than twenty-two inches by thirty-two inches—a size much smaller than that of the evening London journals at the present time. At that time the weight of a newspaper did not exceed 1½*oz.*, and the stamp duty was 4*d.* on each paper less 20 per cent. The stamp duty was afterwards reduced to 1*d.*, without any restriction as to the size of newspapers; but by an Act of Parliament subsequently passed a limitation was imposed upon their size. It appeared to him that, in 1836, the Government of that time had no idea what would be the result of the introduction of steam printing machines and railways in bringing on the present fix which they were in. There was no reason why the law of 1836 should have been accompanied with such an endless quantity of restrictions as to stamps, weight, and size. The effect of that law was to throw on the Post Office an enormous quantity of work, which it could not have sustained without the railways. He thought this was a fitting opportunity to consider whether the postage law should not be so altered as to make the carriage remunerative at lower rates, and the object of his proposition was to enable newspapers to pass through the post at the rate of one halfpenny for every two ounces. He considered that, unless such a system were adopted, the country newspaper proprietors would be subjected to very great hardship, for many of them would have to reduce the price of their journals to 2*d.* He had seen "specimen" newspapers, which were published day by day at the price of 1*d.*, and being to all intents and purposes newspapers, so long as the present law remained in force they were unquestionably illegal. He held in his hand a newspaper which was issued every day at the price of a penny, and he considered that it was most unjust to existing newspapers that such publications should be allowed. The hon. Member handed the paper to which he referred to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who observed that it was a "specimen" number. He was aware it was a "specimen" number; but these "specimen" numbers were published day after day. He understood that there was an indisposition on the part of the Government to reduce the duty below 1*d.*, but although 1*d.* might not be a high charge for a newspaper which weighed four ounces, and the cost of which was 5*d.*, it would amount in the case of such specimens as those to which he had directed the attention of the House to a charge of 100 per cent. He thought the country owed much to the newspaper press for its contribution to the information and enjoyment of the people during the last twenty or thirty years. The press had become a great educational institute, and he was most anxious that the humble classes of society should have the means of procuring newspapers at a moderate price. He did not see the necessity of making a distinction between newspapers and other periodical publications, but thought they ought all to be classed under the same category, and he could assure the House that in making these suggestions he was animated not by a spirit of opposition to the Government, but by a desire to make the Bill generally acceptable. He did not wish to press his proposition unduly, but he trusted that the Government would give it every favourable consideration.

MR. BARROW said, he regretted extremely to find that the Government did not accede to the substitution of a half-penny stamp in return for the privilege of passing newspapers through the Post Office. In his opinion, this was a most serious question, affecting, as it did, the educated classes of the country, to whom the reading of the current news had become a necessity. The hardship inflicted by the Bill in its present state would fall more particularly upon constituencies such as he represented, and would scarcely be felt in large towns, to which unstamped papers would be brought by railways. But it would operate most unfairly to the proprietors of newspapers published in country districts which must depend mainly for their circulation in the rural districts upon the facilities afforded by the Post Office, and he therefore hoped the Government would take into their serious consideration the propriety of reducing the tax on that class of the community to a halfpenny, because, if they did not, he was certain they would destroy much of the good anticipated by the supporters of the measure—namely, that all classes, and particularly the lower classes, of the community should participate in the intellectual advantage and amusement of reading the newspapers. It must be remembered that persons living in country districts derived their whole supply of newspapers through the post, and from those local newspaper proprietors whose capital could ill afford an extreme pressure upon it. As far as the question of revenue was concerned, he believed they would rather gain than lose by reducing the postal charge to a halfpenny, for, if they did not do so, private enterprise would soon compete with the Post Office in rural districts, and the revenue from this source might be entirely lost.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2,

Mr. COLLIER said, that the Amendment of which his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Cowan) had given notice having been withdrawn, he would venture to suggest some alterations in this clause, which he thought would embody the propositions of his hon. Friend. He would therefore propose that, instead of a stamp of a penny, which was imposed by this clause as the charge for postal conveyance, a halfpenny stamp should be substituted, and that such stamp should be imposed for each transmission by post, which he thought would be the fair and equitable manner of settling this question. He did not put this proposition entirely upon financial grounds, but upon the higher considerations of the duty they owed to the country to promote the cause of education, and it was therefore of the greatest possible importance that the best class of newspapers should be allowed the greatest possible facilities for circulation. Any tax restricting the transmission of knowledge was essentially a tax upon knowledge itself, and therefore it was with some confidence that he expected the support of those who had so long agitated for the repeal of the taxes on knowledge, in favour of his proposition for the reduction of the tax upon the conveyance of this most important species of knowledge to a halfpenny. There was another reason for pressing this Amendment. At present the London papers were upon the same footing as those in the provinces, a duty of a penny was imposed upon the transmission of all the London papers, being at the rate of 25 per cent upon those published at fourpence, 33 per cent on three-penny papers, and so on, which would operate materially as a protective duty on the lower class of provincial papers as against those published in London; but, if the Bill passed as it now stood, a low class of provincial papers would spring up, which, to some extent, would be nothing less than piratical publications from the London press. They all knew the enormous expense with which some of the London papers were conducted—they had an opportunity of reading the early and important news received by their means from the seat of war, they knew the high literary character of their articles, and they remembered the eulogium passed upon one of those papers by the hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Sir B. Lytton), who had declared that if he desired to leave to remote posterity some memorial of existing British civilisation he would appeal to a file of The Times newspaper. It seemed to him (Mr. Collier) that the imposition of a penny would be a protective duty, and that while it would materially diminish the circulation of London newspapers it would unduly increase provincial ones of a low class. He would not go into detail respecting the question of revenue, but merely refer the House to an able paper drawn up by a deputation which lately waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which gave very satisfactory reasons for supposing that, in all probability, the reduction of the postal charge to a halfpenny would improve it. In that document an opinion was attributed to Mr. Rowland Hill, to the effect that, with a reduction of the stamp duty and the continuance of a high rate of postage, not half the present number of newspapers would be circulated through the post. That was an additional reason for reducing it to a halfpenny, for he must say that he viewed with apprehension a decree of the circulation of the London papers throughout the country to the extent of half their present number. Such a question was beyond financial considerations; but, if Mr. Rowland Hill's opinion were correct, there was every reason to suppose that if a halfpenny stamp were substituted an increase in the revenue would result. The Post Office, he felt confident, would not be able to compete with the railways if they retained the penny stamp, for he was informed that at present seven impressions of The Times were carried by railway for one penny, and that a large number of the Leeds Mercury, containing seventy or eighty pages, were conveyed a distance of thirty two miles through the district for the like sum. There could be no doubt, therefore, that as a mere question of competition the railways could beat the Post Office. His Motion would be to vary the clause by inserting a provision to the effect that every periodical publication specified, stamped with a halfpenny stamp, or having such stamp affixed to it, should be allowed to pass once through the Post Office, and that every such additional stamp should entitle it to retransmission, subject to the provisions of the Act. That would leave the question of the weight and size of the publication so allowed to be transmitted open for further consideration.

MR. COWAN said, he wished to explain that it was not competent for him to propose his Amendment before Mr. Speaker left the Chair. It was his wish, if possible, to have elicited some expression of opinion from the Government favourable to his views, but he had not yet succeeded in doing so. He knew that there were great difficulties in carrying out a measure like this, in connection with the Post Office, and he should be unwilling to take any course by which the Post Office would be forced to adopt a measure which would cause inconvenience. He still hoped to hear some assurance from the Government that they entertained a favourable opinion of his proposal. In the meantime he would support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend.

LORD STANLEY said, the question immediately before the Committee was whether, in sending a newspaper through the Post Office, the stamp should be a penny or a halfpenny? and there was a further question, whether the postage charged, whatever it might be, should send a newspaper through the post once only or several times? Now as to the latter question, affecting the retransmission of newspapers, he apprehended there was some little collision between what ought to be done in deference to existing interests, and what should be done on the principles of abstract right. He never could see on what ground of abstract right it was that a letter of half an ounce with a penny stamp went through the Post Office only once while a newspaper with a stamp of the same value might go an indefinite number of times. If Parliament were dealing with this question de novo he should have no hesitation in saying that this right of retransmission was one that could not be maintained; but they had to deal with interests that had grown up under the law, and looking at the matter in this light, even the right hon. Gentleman below the gangway (Mr. Gladstone), whose measure was more stringent than the present, proposed to retain the right of retransmission for a considerable period. If it was proposed to do away with that right at once and without previous notice, he thought it would be a departure from the ordinary course of Parliamentary proceedings and be productive of injury to interests created under the law, and a greater evil than the Legislature would be morally justified in inflicting. The proposal now was, that the price of transmission should be not a tax, but a postage stamp, and the question now before the Committee was whether that stamp should be a penny or a halfpenny. That question had not been raised till that evening in the House, but they were all more or less familiar with it by means of information which had been very industriously circulated. He believed it would be admitted that there was no wish to make revenue out of this carriage of newspapers; but, on the other hand, the newspaper interest had no right to ask that their productions should be carried at less than cost price. It should be as near as possible an equal bargain between the parties, by which neither the revenue on the one hand, nor the newspapers on the other, should gain. If the House of Commons once laid down that principle, the question would become one wholly of detail, and rather a question for the Post Office department than for the House to settle. He believed it was the opinion of the Post Office that a halfpenny would not be sufficient to cover the expenses of transmission. Whether that was so or not, there were some in the House better able to say than he was; but he begged to say a word or two as to the risk of the Post Office being undersold by private means. That risk did not weigh very much with him. The House must calculate on an enormous increase in the number of newspapers, which would throw an additional burden upon the Post Office. It was already found that in some places the increase of weight in the carriage of newspapers had been such as to cause considerable inconvenience to the local post. He did not know that there could be any object in attempting to prevent newspapers being carried by private parties. There was something to be looked at on both sides; but it was, in his opinion, a question which very much depended on what the Post Office Department might think would be a remunerative price. He believed a halfpenny would be below that price, and therefore he would support the proposition in the Bill for a penny. If the Committee were to carry out the intention of the hon. and learned Member—if 5oz. or 6oz. of printed matter were to be carried for a halfpenny—it would be difficult to maintain the discrepancy which would then exist between those two articles to which he had a short time since alluded—namely manuscript letters and printed matter. The difference was one for which he could see no fair ground or justification. He thought the House ought to avoid making unnecessary alterations; and, unless they were to have a different opinion from the Postmaster-General, he thought the penny stamp proposed in the Bill should be adhered to. For the present only, he would be prepared to continue the privilege of retransmission, but he could not conceal from himself that sooner or later it would have to be done away with.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must beg to recall the attention of the Committee to the origin of the Bill now before them. The Bill originated in difficulty which arose in enforcing the compulsory stamp. It was found that the law was ambiguous, and some inconvenience had arisen in the practical-administration of it. A Resolution was passed by the House last year condemnatory of the stamp, but not adverting to the pecuniary amount of the stamp, and in the present Session a Bill was introduced by the right hon. gentleman his predecessor, dealing with the question. The object of that Bill was to remove the compulsory stamp; and the Bill now under the consideration of the Committee was founded on identically the same principle. It was limited to the removal of the practical difficulty that had arisen in the enforcement of the stamp on all newspapers, and the wish of the Government was to make no further alteration than was absolutely necessary for the accomplishment of that limited object. They did not ask to lower the rate of the duty, but keep it exactly as it was, at the rate of a penny for a sheet of a certain size. The great objection taken to the measure on the second reading was, that it would endanger a large amount of revenue at a time when the expenditure of the country exceeded its income. It was then shown that the sacrifice of revenue, though considerable, would be met in the financial scheme of the year; and, accordingly, in the statement which he submitted on Friday an Estimate was made allowing for the deficiency of revenue in consequence of the change which it was proposed should take place. Since the second reading of the Bill—when they were told that so much depended on the maintenance of the stamp—a further question had been raised, namely, the reduction of the penny stamp to a halfpenny, and it was argued that this would be attended with no diminution, but rather with an increase of the revenue. Now, it certainly was possible that the sanguine calculations of the promoters of that plan might be realized; but, at the same time, they were founded on most uncertain data, and, therefore, the Government were not prepared to run the risk that would attend such a reduction of the duty, but felt themselves bound to adhere to the original proposition which they had made. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Collier) in proposing his amendment, had involved himself in a difficulty which arose out of the change he advocated. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed both to retain the impressed stamp and to introduce a postage stamp. If the impressed stamp were retained it would be difficult to prevent the re-transmission of newspapers with the impressed stamp through the post, without imposing upon the Post Office the trouble of examining every newspaper and obliterating the stamp. If they were creating a system for the first time, unquestionably the most convenient plan would be not to have the impressed stamp at all, but to make the transmission of newspapers through the post depend on a postage stamp, the weight of each newspaper being at the same time limited. If the hon. and learned Member introduced a postage stamp, it became necessary to impose a limit of weight; and then immediately arose the difficult question of how to reconcile the weight for newspapers with the present limit of superficial inches. The limit retained in the Bill was wholly independent of limited weight, and, if the hon. and learned Gentleman introduced a limit of weight to bear some proportion to the superficial limit, it would be the means of producing great confusion and difficulty at the Post Office. On these grounds, combined with the uncertainty of the half-penny stamp producing the amount of revenue anticipated, he must oppose the proposed amendment.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, since he admitted the principle of diminishing the revenue for an educational purpose, would consent to diminish it a little more, if necessary, for the purpose of obtaining the educational advantages likely to result from the proposed amendment. Great weight was due to the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) that the retransmission through the post of the London newspapers, conducted, as they were, with such great ability and containing matter of such great educational importance, should be in every way encouraged. He believed that the law of the United States at the present moment established a differential postage on the transmission of newspapers within certain limits, and the result was that the transmission over the United States of newspapers, conducted with very great ability and at great expense, was prevented, and encouragement to an infinite extent was given to smaller and less carefully conducted newspapers. It was a singular fact that the great agitation on this matter came from the proprietors of provincial newspapers, who thought that they would be benefited by the proposed amendment, and there could be no doubt that the great London newspapers would also be benefited by it. He believed that the advantage of the transmission of such a newspaper as The Times at the smallest possible expense could not be overrated. They all had in London the opportunity of having on their breakfast table such papers, conducted with an intellectual power which might compete with that necessary for the highest productions of literature, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer by any means in his power, even at a small additional sacrifice to the revenue, promoted their larger circulation, he would be serving both the literature and the education of the country. He believed that the practical difficulties of the proposition had been overrated, and he conceived that retransmission by post would not take place except in cases where the newspaper contained something of sufficient interest to create a great demand for it. Therefore, even if there were a temporary loss to the revenue, in that respect the advantage to the country would be very great.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) that the question of retransmission must be dealt with within certain limits and upon grounds which were already established. The privilege of retransmission had reference to the fixed habits of the community, and to part with it suddenly would be an inconvenience; but the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was so much enamoured with retransmission that he strongly insisted upon its merits. He proposed to give the London newspaper, in some shape or other, an extraordinary right, which smacked very much of their old friend Protection; but he, for one, thought the superior article ought to stand upon its own merits. But if the hon. Gentleman was so much in favour of retransmission, he ought upon that very ground not to vote for the Amendment, but to support the Bill as it stood, because the Amendment virtually proposed to abolish the privilege of retransmission, while the Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to retain it. With respect to the question of price, he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn that it ought to rest entirely with the Executive to determine it; but, said the hon. Member who last addressed them, "You have for educational purposes consented to a diminution of the tax, and it is no very great matter if you consent to a further diminution." But that was not the question before the Committee. True, it was agreed on all hands that no profit should be expected from this source of revenue, but the question was not whether the State should be saddled with a perpetual service for the benefit of that portion of the community who printed and who read newspapers. If they did what the Amendment proposed, it would be practically subsidising the transmission of newspapers at the expense of the State, which was bad in principle; but in his opinion it was totally unnecessary. He knew no reason in the world why literature at large might not claim such a privilege just as well as newspapers; but the real question to be determined was, what was the lowest charge at which the State could undertake the transmission of newspapers without incurring loss. Of course, between large towns newspapers could be transmitted in parcels by railway cheaper than by post, but it was not fair to treat this as a question of competition between the Post Office and private companies. Private companies were at liberty to make such arrangements as best suited their own convenience; they could reject or transmit just as they pleased; but it was quite different with the Post Office, because it had no alternative but to carry for everybody at a fixed scale of charge. The consequence would be then, if the Amendment were adopted, that the railways would carry newspapers in bulk, while the Post Office would have to perform the worst and most unprofitable part of the transmission service. Now, could the Post Office undertake for a halfpenny to perform the most difficult and the most unprofitable portion of the transport, such as carrying newspapers to the greatest distance or into remote and unfrequented quarters? That was a question very much for the Government themselves to determine, but his conviction was that the service could not be performed for a halfpenny. It was easy to say that the loss would be small between a halfpenny and the cost of transport, which might be three farthings; but the loss became no small matter when they came to multiply the farthing by 90,000,000, or by the still larger figures which an increased number of newspapers must necessarily occasion. An average charge must therefore be fixed in reference to that circumstance, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, knowing all the facts, stated that he could not undertake to perform the service for the remuneration which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Collier) desired to establish. He had himself considered the question as well as he could, and his conviction was that this rate of a halfpenny would entail on the Post Office a very heavy cost for the benefit of the publishers and readers of newspapers. He had been told that, with the charge made for the early trains from London to Liverpool and Manchester, it did not pay to send down the advertising sheet of The Times, and that, while the sheet containing the news was forwarded by the six o'clock train, the advertising sheet was actually retained in London to go by the Post Office train at ten o'clock; so great was the necessity for economising the expense of transport in order to make this early delivery pay. Neither was it found, he believed, that the extra charge made by those who undertook to deliver those newspapers in the towns was ever less than 1d. It was difficult, however, to get at any precise data with regard to these matters, and for that reason they were not justified now in going below the 1d. charge. They ought carefully to examine the ground as they went, and not enter blindly on a course in which, if unsuccessful, they could not retrace their steps. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would leave it to the Government to look into the subject, to see if they could carry newspapers and other printed matter at a less charge than 1d., and not consent now to burden the State with a heavy charge for a purpose which it was generally felt was not perfectly legitimate or fair towards all classes of the community.

MR. BARROW said, he did not think it was likely that the Post Office would lose by the transmission of newspapers at a halfpenny, for he was informed that in America a newspaper could travel 3,000 miles for one cent, and certainly they were not the people in America to allow the Post Office to be worked at a loss. The difficulty anticipated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the retransmission would be easily obviated by requiring that the direction should be written across the stamp, or that it should be obliterated in the same way as letter stamps now were; and that when the newspaper was transmitted a second time, a second stamp should be affixed, to be obliterated in like manner, and that, in the absence of such second stamp, a retransmitted newspaper should be charged 1d. Neither did he share in the anticipations which had been expressed as to the labour and expense to which the Post Office would be put in delivering newspapers in thinly populated districts; for, of course, they would not be obliged to deliver newspapers except in the districts where they were now obliged to deliver letters.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he apprehended that the proposition to which the Committee was now asked by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth to accede to was, that the State should undertake to carry periodical publications of any size or any weight for a halfpenny.

tleman must remember that they were limited in their superficies.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that was not the proposition. As he understood the Amendment, the Post Office was to be required to carry all newspapers or periodical publications without limitation of size or weight. [Mr. COLLIER said, that would be a matter for future consideration.] A periodical publication was to be carried for a halfpenny, whatever its weight, but a pamphlet would have to be weighed like a letter, and to contribute probably 3d., 4d., or 6d. for every transmission. Suppose, for instance, that he were slandered by a periodical publication, was it right that that publication, whatever its size or weight, should be transmitted through the country for a halfpenny, while the printed answer which he might make to that slander, because it was only an occasional publication, would be charged 3d. or 4d. every time it was transmitted through the post? Therefore, before he could consent to allow these periodical publications to be transmitted for a halfpenny, he must have a clear understanding whether occasional publications of the same weight would be transmitted at the same rate of postage. Justice in competition was quite as important as any other consideration. At the present time pamphlets were being published to defend the characters of Lord Raglan and Sir John Burgoyne against the attacks of the periodical press; but, while the periodical press could circulate and retransmit their attacks without any additional charge for postage, except the original newspaper stamp of 1d., the answers to them, on the contrary, had to pay postage according to letter weight at each transmission. If that were to be the practice, it was not likely that Lord Raglan, as the noble Lord the Member for London had predicted of him, "would rise superior to the slanders of a ribald press;" on the contrary, what he would require would be to be put on a fair footing with it. He should oppose the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, because he saw that it was merely meant to confer a privilege on a certain class of publications, and that it would not have been asked for had it been quite clear to the applicants that it was to be extended to all publications. It was an attempt to establish for the future a postal privilege in place of the advantages which it was erroneously supposed newspapers had enjoyed under the operation of a compulsory stamp.

Knowing that this postal charge could be at any time reduced by a Treasury Order if the Government should think fit so to do, or if the newspaper proprietors could persuade them that it could be done with advantage, he should certainly oppose the introduction of this Amendment into the Bill.

MR. PHILIPPS said, he hoped the Committees would not consent to try any experiments with the Post Office until they had before them a complete and clear balance-sheet of the profit and loss of the Post Office service. It was stated that the gain in this department was, for the last year, 16,538*l.*; but this did not include the expense of the packet service. In the absence of a clear statement of the expense of the packet service, there would be a general delusion with regard to the clear income derivable from the Post Office. In the statement of the actual income of 1854-55 the Post Office revenue appears as 1,276,000*l.* This sum does not include the expense of the packet service, which, according to a Parliamentary paper just delivered, amounts to 812,826*l.* This does not prove a deficiency, but a very considerable difference between real and imaginary revenue. Persons who have examined the matter carefully are of opinion that if the expense of the packet service had been clearly brought into the account in several years past the Post Office accounts would have presented an actual deficiency.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 3.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that by Clause 2 of the Bill they subjected periodicals to the same regulations as newspapers, and by Clause 3 those periodicals would be entitled to transmission by post. Clause 4 provided that newspapers should be registered. There was, however, some doubt whether Clauses 4, 5, and 6, were obligatory or not upon all newspapers. If they were not, this inconsistency would exist—that whereas periodical publications would be assimilated to newspapers, and stamped newspapers must register and give security under 6 & 7 Will. IV.; on the other hand, newspapers that were not stamped would not be required to be registered, unless the publishers thought fit. Now, what he wanted to know was this—why should stamped newspapers be subjected to compulsory registration and unstamped newspapers be exempted from this condition?

That point, be it observed, had nothing whatever to do with the vexed question as to the definition of a newspaper. The respectable journals which paid the stamp duty were to be subject to the wise and wholesome law that compelled them to declare who were their proprietors, in order that any person whom they libelled might know who was the responsible individual against whom he should proceed to obtain redress, and why, therefore, should those publishers who did not pay this tax, and who might overwhelm the country with penny and halfpenny publications slandering everybody, be wholly released from this salutary restraint, and be, in fact, afforded facilities for the circulation of wholesale libels? It was clear that the wording of the clause required alteration, as there should be but one law applying to all newspapers alike, whether stamped or unstamped, for the purpose of adequately protecting the community.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was perfectly competent for the Committee to make the alteration which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) proposed; but, if that were done, the object in view must be enforced by penalties, and this measure had been drawn so as to avoid all imposition of penalties. The 7th clause gave the Board of Inland Revenue power to issue stamps, and if any newspaper or periodical desired to enjoy the privilege of transmission by post for 1d. it must apply to them in order to be stamped. On this privilege being granted to them, the publishers must comply with the clauses respecting registration and securities. In fact, therefore, the operation of these clauses would be contingent on the receipt of stamps, because the delivery of stamps would be made conditional on compliance with these regulations. The reason why the Bill had been drawn in this manner was, that it was thought every periodical publication or newspaper enjoying any circulation of the least consideration or extent would, for its own interest and the convenience of its customers, apply for the stamping of a portion of its impression, thus voluntarily bringing itself within the scope and operation of these clauses. It was, however, conceivable that a certain number of obscure and unimportant newspapers and periodicals of extremely limited circulation might contrive to exist for a time without stamping any portion of their impression for the sake of the postal facilities which accompanied that process; but that was a very improbable contingency, and there could be little doubt that the Bill as it stood would practically, and without the enforcement of penalties, insure compliance by all newspapers worthy of mention with that system of registration and securities which protected, not the Government or public authorities only, but private individuals, against libellous and slanderous attacks upon character. If, however, it should be thought desirable to insist by means of penalties upon registration, and the giving of securities on the part of all periodical publications without exception, it would be competent for the House to give that extension to the measure; but Her Majesty's Government did not propose to make these provisions compulsory.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he had prepared a proviso to be added to the clause, if the Committee thought fit, requiring all newspapers, though unstamped, to register and give security under a penalty of 20*l.*

MR. G. BUTT said, that this Bill would release from the operation of the existing law of registration such publications as did not choose to avail themselves of the postal regulation. It would also sweep away another valuable protection provided by the existing law, which required securities to be given by responsible persons, so that persons who might have to bring actions for slander against newspaper proprietors might not find that they had been proceeding against mere "men of straw." The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the respectable papers would apply to be stamped, and thus become subject to these wholesome conditions; but he should remember that there was no necessary connection between a mere postal regulation and the registration of publications; and the existing law treated the two things, which rested upon entirely different grounds, as perfectly distinct. The fear of mischief from libellous publications was not so slight as the right hon. Gentleman would have them believe, because it might suit the interest of persons to circulate them in large towns, where they would not care for postal privileges. On what principle, then, could they maintain the existing law against the respectable newspapers, which would least require the check it imposed, while the less respectable class of publications, which would most need the restraint of such a law, would be wholly exempted from its operation, and left to enjoy unrestricted license?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. and learned Member would observe that the Act to which he referred was limited only to newspapers, and did not apply to all periodicals. Now, the Bill under consideration applied to all periodical publications published within thirty-one days; the hon. and learned Member by his proposal would, however, extend the regulations of this Act to periodical publications not comprised within the original Act. There were a great many publications at a half-penny and a penny supported by religious societies, which had a large circulation amongst the lower classes; these papers were not transmitted by post, but in monthly parcels, and he did not apprehend that if this Bill passed these publications would seek to avail themselves of the postal privilege, and it would be very hard to bring them under the regulation of a law which was not originally intended to apply to them. By limiting the registration of publications to the cases of those persons who voluntarily sought to avail themselves of the postal privilege the House would apply the Act to all newspapers of importance, and, by the spontaneous operation of the Act, would exempt from it these periodical publications to which it was not intended to apply.

MR. G. BUTT said, that at present all newspapers must be registered, and give security to answer for libels; but the effect of the present Bill would be to enable parties to publish newspapers without availing themselves of the postal regulations, and then they would not be under the necessity of registering and finding security.

MR. STANLEY said, that some hon. Members thought that, because they voted for compulsory registration, they therefore voted for security being given in case of libel, but he did not think so, and was of opinion that the securities required were nugatory as a protection, and simply vexatious to those who had to give them. He wished to draw the distinction between unnecessary security and that which was alone contemplated by the Bill, namely, registration, which simply meant that every person issuing a periodical publication should make a declaration, stating the name of the proprietor. There was nothing in this which could be called an annoyance or a hardship, and he was in favour of the compulsory registration, if necessary, of all periodical publications, but protested against carrying with it that which had nothing to do with it, namely, the question of securities.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would beg to move, as an Amendment, that the following words should be inserted in the clause—

"And be it enacted that, after the publishing of this Act, the proprietors of every newspaper or periodical publication shall make and deliver," &c.

The insertion of these words was rendered necessary by the terms of the clause as it at present stood, as by it the registration of all periodicals was not required.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would ask the hon. and learned Member by what machinery he proposed to carry into effect his proposition that every person who published a periodical should register it? They would be obliged, if his Amendment became law, to have officers to go round the country to compel publishers to register. He did not think it would be possible to enforce a general registration without having new machinery, which would be of a vexatious and troublesome character. He believed that registration under the existing Act was entirely neglected, and that if even stamped newspapers were required to comply with all the provisions of the clause requiring registration, the Board of Inland Revenue would have little else to do. He was in favour of tracing authorship, and of bringing home to every responsible person the publication of a calumny, but there was at present a law in force which effected this, as it required that to every paper should be affixed the place of abode and name of the printer, who was obliged, under the Act, to keep a record of his employers, and this he was compelled to produce under order of a justice of the peace. They therefore, he considered, had a sufficient remedy for the evil apprehended, and this attempt to enforce registration was consequently unnecessary.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that no difficulty as to machinery to enforce registration would arise, as under the Act of the 6 & 7 Wm. IV., quoted in the Bill before the Committee, this was fully provided for. He objected to the argument used by the right hon. Member who had just addressed them, that because certain persons broke the law which was not enforced, therefore the law should be abolished. The right hon. Member had expressed a strong desire to trace the authorship of libels; but how could this be done unless registration was enforced? If, as the right hon. Member had stated, cheap papers were to spring up on all sides, conducted by men of surprising ability, who would crush the present papers—the old monopolists—he thought, at least, that they ought to be afforded a chance of knowing those who crushed them.

MR. WARNER said, he thought it was admitted that there was something wrong in the present system of registration; but this, in his opinion, would be rendered much worse by the present clause. Some such amendment as that proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) was called for; but he could not agree with the hon. and learned Member as to the propriety of enforcing registration by the cumbrous machinery referred to.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was in the unfortunate predicament of disliking both the Proposal of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Enniskillen. They had opposite characteristics and opposite merits. He admitted that the hon. and learned Gentleman's proposal was, in his opinion, more consistent with the uniformity of principle which that House ought to observe in its proceedings than that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he objected to it because the principle upon which it was founded was a wrong one. The hon. and learned Gentleman required that all periodical publications should be registered, and that certain declarations should be made in regard to them. But what security would be gained by that registration which was not gained by the present law requiring the printer's name to be upon the publication? He had listened in vain for an indication of any such security or practical advantage. It might be true that in cases of libel the publication of the printer's name did not point out the real libeller, but it would be quite as true with respect to any name which might be registered. It appeared to him that the only effect of the Amendment would be to impose unnecessary trouble and vexation upon many persons, and he should therefore say "No" to it. He must also say "No" to the right hon. Gentleman's clause, because it was irrational, and one part of it was not consistent with the other. The present law requiring the registration of all publications which contained discussions upon public affairs was intelligible, and was intended to guard against a particular danger, but his right hon. Friend abandoned that law, and said that his Bill would be effectual in obtaining registration and securities from all respectable periodicals, while non-respectable periodicals would escape. He should have thought that non-respectable periodicals alone were those upon which it was necessary to impose restrictions, and his right hon. Friend, therefore, in one sense included too little, and in another sense too much. The present law took no cognisance of periodicals, but an abusive practice had grown up whereby proprietors of periodicals, not being newspapers, declared them to be newspapers, in order to obtain postal privileges. That absurd anomaly—in some cases it might be called a falsehood—his right hon. Friend was going to adopt and to erect into a principle, by requiring that the proprietors of all periodicals which desired postal privileges, whether newspapers or not, whether they discussed public affairs or not, should register and give securities. He thought the House of Commons ought not to make regulations of that kind, in which it was impossible to trace a reason or a principle. His right hon. Friend's clause would include a vast number of periodicals to which the law of registration and security was never intended to apply; it would include those which it was not important to include, and not those which ought to be included. He was consequently unwilling to be the means of importing so irrational a proposition into the statute book, and should therefore vote against it.

MR. DISRAELI said, he would not attempt to answer the right hon. Gentleman's objections to the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he thought that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) was both rational and consistent. Let them see what was the principle involved in that Amendment, and what were the difficulties in the way of its application to practice. The press enjoyed a very great liberty and exercised a very great power; he did not grudge it that liberty and that power, but they had a right to exact from it the responsibility which ought to be the condition upon which all power should be exercised. Now, what was the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend? His hon. and learned Friend proposed that the system of registration which at present partially existed, and which the Government proposed to maintain, should be general instead of partial in its application. That system of registration was connected with no vexatious conditions whatever. All it sought was that the persons who exercised the great power which must be vested in those who conducted the public press in this country should be responsible for the manner in which they exercised it, that society should know who were responsible for the opinions which the press expressed upon public questions, for the criticisms which it offered upon the conduct of public men, and that the power which influenced opinions should be brought to the bar of that opinion which it attempted to regulate. He supposed no gentleman could think such a proposition irrational, or not calculated to be beneficial to the country. But the right hon. Gentleman said that society, by the present law, had that means of redress to which it was entitled, as no publication could be produced unless the printer's name was affixed to it. Every one, however, knew very well that a publication might appear and exercise a great influence affecting the character of an individual, affecting even the course of events at a critical moment, which bore the name, as printer, of an individual who did not even exist. The required effect might be produced in a few hours, or in one hour, by a pamphlet or placard to which an imaginary name was attached, while those who were injured by it had no security or redress. The new law would require the registration of the name of the proprietor of a journal, not names of the authors of articles which appeared in it, nor that of a mere man of straw, but the name of a person whose station was such that redress might be obtained from him by those whom the journal might have injured. He therefore thought that the two right hon. Gentlemen (Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Gibson) had not made any sufficient objections to his hon. and learned Friend's proposal, which was founded upon a broad principle of justice and fairness, requiring that the public should have a simple mode of obtaining redress when they had received an injury. If the principle upon which the proposal was founded were right, was the application of it to practice difficult? He was not called upon in vindicating a principle immediately to find means by which it could be put into practice; but he did not think, judging from our past experience, that the difficulties in the way of doing so were so great as the right hon. Gentleman had intimated. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) had shown that by the present law the humblest proprietor or publisher could without any great trouble or vexation be made responsible to society. The proprietor and publisher had nothing to do but to make the local authority acquainted with his purpose, so that if he offended, society might have the redress to which it was entitled. He hoped the Committee would feel that his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment tended to secure the enjoyment of the liberty of the press.

MR. DRUMMOND: Sir, it is said that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen will catch some newspapers that do not want to be caught, and others it is not wanted to catch. Sir, I know a newspaper which wanted to be caught. The right hon. Gentleman who has just resumed his seat has spoken of the "liberty of the press." That has been long spoken of. It has been said that it must be "free as the air we breathe; take it away, we die." But, Sir, what is "the liberty of the press?" It is the liberty of a certain number of persons to slander anonymously whomever they please, against whom you have no redress. It is freedom to the anonymous libeller, and slavery to all the rest. The only way to meet this is to prohibit any person from publishing anything anonymously, periodically, or otherwise. Sir, no honest man is ashamed of the sentiments he expresses. You talk in this country, more than in any other, of your "love of fair play," "meeting a man face to face, and a good stand-up fight," &c. Why, where is the fair play of these anonymous libellers? You have—you know it well—a fear of moral assassination. You long to punish the evil-doers, and you are afraid to do so. You know that the only way to do it effectually is to force them to give their names as they do in France. Two years ago it was very much the fashion of Gentlemen on this side to speak of France as a great model. Well, let us imitate France, at all events, in this respect. They have found out a way in France to prevent persons from publishing without putting their names to what they publish. And the law advisers of the Crown could, with a very little exercise of ingenuity, I apprehend, devise a way of securing the same object in this country. As it is,

Sir, it is a mere moral Thugge, and I hope means will be found for suppressing this great moral nuisance.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his belief was that the clause would be found practically to work without material inconvenience, and that all those newspapers whose circulation was considerable, and whose influence therefore was felt over a wide circuit of the country, would be drawn into it. He would admit, however, that the effect of the Bill as it was now drawn, while it removed the objection that a false declaration must be made, as now, by persons publishing circulars and periodicals of that kind, and who now enjoyed the benefit of the stamp by making what was, in fact, a false declaration that they published a newspaper—while that would be removed by the Bill as it now stood, at the same time it would introduce another anomaly, namely, that it would subject that class of publications to registration. He had no objection, after the opinions he had heard expressed, if the Committee should prefer it, to postpone the clause relating to registration and securities, and to attempt to limit them to newspapers. The effect of that would be to make this Bill conform more exactly to the object of the original Acts, to except periodical publications generally, and to retain the word "newspaper" in the Bill which it had been an object to omit, on account of the difficulty of putting a precise legal construction upon it. However, he believed, a legal construction could be put upon the word "newspaper," and if the Committee would go on with the remaining clauses, he would consider this clause, and endeavour to give it that effect.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he hoped in the year 1855, it would not be thought necessary for the safety of our institutions and of private character to put restraints upon the publication of opinion. Both with respect to suretyship and registration the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer might save himself trouble by enforcing the law as it now stood. The Act of Parliament was passed by the late Lord Castlereagh, and was called one of the Six Acts. The preamble stated that—

"Whereas many papers containing observations upon Public Acts tending to excite the hatred of the public to the constitution of this realm, and also vilifying our holy religion, have lately been published in great numbers, and at a very small price, and it is expedient that the same should be restrained."

It then went on to enact that every person printing or publishing any newspaper or any pamphlet (let hon. Members of that House who wrote pamphlets, but who never gave any security, observe that), or other paper containing any public intelligence or occurrence, or any remarks or observations thereon, or upon any matter in Church or State, which should not exceed two sheets, that is 7½ square inches, or should be published for sale at a less price than 6d. until he had entered into a recognisance before a Baron of the Exchequer, and found two sufficient securities in 40*l.* in London, and 20*l.* in the country, to be answerable for any blasphemous or seditious libel, should be subject to a penalty of 20*l.* And by an Act of William IV. this was extended to private libel. It was under this Act of 60th Geo. III., c. 9., that securities were now taken, and not under the Newspaper Act; and therefore he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would not repeal the 60th Geo. III., c. 9. If he would not repeal it, he asked him, above all, as a Minister of the Crown, to do his duty, and to take care that Members of the Government did not violate the law themselves. There never was so flagrant a violation of that law as the letter of the noble Lord the Member for London, (Lord J. Russell) to the Bishop of Durham. That was a pamphlet which commented on matters of Church and State, and which was sold in great numbers at a small price, in respect of which no security had been given, and the publisher of which was liable under the 60th Geo. III. c. 9., to forfeit the sum of 20*l.* How large a sum did Lord John Russell owe, in respect of that publication, to the Queen at the present moment? Unless the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer enforced the law against his colleagues, it was only a clap-trap to call upon the House of Commons to re-enact a law already in existence. The extraordinary thing was this, that the late Government of which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) was a Member, agreed to abolish these securities; and that the noble Lord the present Prime Minister was a Member of that Cabinet, and must therefore have agreed to abolish those securities. In point of fact, the majority of that Cabinet formed also a majority of the existing Cabinet; it was not, therefore, asking too much that they who a few weeks ago were willing to abolish registration and other securities should not now come forward and superfluously re-enact them. He had hoped that when a measure relating to the press of this country was entertained by the Government they would have had a Bill brought in based upon something like a general principle, and reviewing, as it were, the whole of the law concerning the press, so that the public might know what the law upon the press really was. The Bill which was introduced by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer did repeal Acts and parts of Acts which to a very considerable extent had grown obsolete; but by the present measure many of those Acts would remain unrepealed. He had mentioned one of them; he would now refer to another. He found an Act the preamble of which set forth that—

"Whereas a traitorous conspiracy had long been carried on by persons in this country in conjunction with persons abroad for the purpose of exciting the people and Government of France to overthrow the constitution and Government and everything both civil and ecclesiastical existing in Great Britain and Ireland, be it therefore enacted," &c.:

and then followed some most stringent provisions, for the purpose of putting the whole printing business of the country under the control of the Government; but scarcely in any respect had that Act been enforced, and yet the Government were afraid to repeal it. He must say one word on the absurdity of making the securities contingent upon the publication going through the post. George III., when he enacted securities, was at least rational, whatever might be said of his policy. But the plan now proposed was irrational and ridiculous. The Act of George III. sought for securities in obtaining a control over the printing and the publishing; for those, after all, were the things they had to guard against. It was the printing and the publishing of a libel, and not the mere act of putting it into the post, that should engage the attention of the Legislature. How absurd was it to say that if a man only paid 1d.—by a Queen's head, and not by the use of the ordinary newspaper stamp—he might have his libel, or his blasphemy and sedition, carried through the Post Office without giving any security whatever; for that would be the effect of your law. Could anything be more inconsistent with the dignity of Parliament than to be legislating in such a puerile manner? Let all these securities be abolished. They were not consistent with the principles of a free press. Trust to the common law to put down the libellers; but let not the right of any man to put his opinions on paper be restricted, whether he be wealthy or poor. What sort of law was that which said that a man worth 400*l.* should be at liberty to express his opinion respecting affairs of Church and State, but that a poor man should not be at liberty to give any opinion on public affairs? It appeared to him that so long as there existed a law requiring a property qualification for the expression of opinions, or for the recital of facts on paper, they could not hold out to the world that the people of this country were in the enjoyment of a free press. They talked, indeed, about abolishing a property qualification for Members of Parliament, and for the holders of various offices, but they were afraid to abolish the qualification which entitled a man to express his opinions on paper. He hoped that, while professing a wish to uphold the freedom of the press and to diffuse knowledge among the people, Parliament would not aid in carrying out such an odious class measure as that which said that none but the upper classes of this country should be at liberty to publish a newspaper, a periodical publication, or a pamphlet for the expression of their opinions on public affairs and public men.

MR. F. SCOTT said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while he took time to consider the amendment proposed, would not be guided by the remarks which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He confessed that, notwithstanding what the right hon. Gentleman had said about the year 1855 being somewhat too late a period to enter upon the question of securities in connection with the press, it did not appear at all too late to him. He believed that the press would consult its own liberty and its own dignity if it encouraged any act of legislation which should require the registration of the names of those persons who were really responsible for that which was inserted in the journals. There was nothing more objectionable than that a party should be brought forward to be prosecuted for a libel in the press who was not the party really guilty either of writing or of publishing that libel. He thought it would be very much more for the dignity of the press, as well as for the interest of the public, that those who were really responsible should be those whose names should be required by law to be registered.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER said, he understood that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that he saw no objection to consider the amendment proposed, but, as there were many important matters which required consideration in reference to these clauses, it was desirable they should be postponed in order to afford his right hon. Friend an opportunity to see whether he could frame them in such a way as would secure to them the approbation of the House. He merely rose for the purpose of suggesting that, as the clauses to which the amendment related were to be postponed, the Committee had better pass on to the other clauses of the Bill.

Amendment withdrawn. Clause postponed.

Clauses 5 to 7 inclusive were also postponed.

Clause 8 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On the question that the Chairman report progress.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know what was expected to be the loss to the revenue in case this Bill should pass? He made out that the stamp duty on newspapers produced at present about 470,000*l.* per annum; now deducting from that amount the probable postal expences, he should like to have an estimate as to the balance likely to remain to the revenue after the passing of this measure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as the stamp in future would not be compulsory, but voluntary, all estimates with reference to the revenue derivable under the new law were necessarily uncertain. He had stated, however, on Friday night, that the opinion of the Government was that the loss to the revenue if the measure should become law, would be about 200,000*l.*

MR. DISRAELI saw that a notice had been given on the part of the Government of certain clauses of a most important character, namely, in reference to newspaper copyright. Now those clauses had not as yet been brought up, neither had any statement been made respecting them by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He wished, therefore, to know whether it was intended to proceed with them?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have the clause with me, and if it be the wish of the Committee I am now prepared to move it. I thought, however, that as some of the clauses have been postponed it might not now be convenient to propose a new clause.

MR. BARROW said, he had understood that the present Bill was not to involve any pains and penalties, but in one of the clauses, referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) there were pains and penalties imposed, and he hoped that that clause would either not be proposed at all, or, if proposed, that full time would be given for its consideration. He thought the practice of printing a clause in this manner to be delivered to Members after they came into the House without an opportunity being afforded to the public at large of seeing it, was inconvenient, and he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not tarnish his fair fame by adopting a practice that was unfair to the public at large.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was quite true the clause did contain a penalty, but that penalty was not to be recovered by the Attorney General, but by the proprietor of a newspaper, for the piracy of any matter contained in his newspaper, and that was a matter for the Committee hereafter to consider. With reference to the observation of the hon. Member (Mr. Barrow) it was his belief that the practice adopted by him was of constant occurrence in that House, and that there was nothing unusual, unprecedented, or exceptional in it. He had given notice of the clause three or four days ago; hon. Members had had an opportunity to consider it, and it had also received circulation amongst the public.

MR. BARROW said, that he did not receive the clause with his Votes, and he did not know any Member who had so received it.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman when he intended to go into Committee again on this Bill? There were some hundreds of persons in a state of agony with regard to the Bill. The proprietors of existing newspapers did not know where they would be next week, and there were other newspapers struggling into life. Great expenses were incurred, and a most important branch of industry would be paralyzed until this Bill should be disposed of.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I will fix it for Monday next.

THE ARMY BEFORE SEBASTOPOL COMMITTEE.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that his name appeared on the paper appended to a notice that the hon. Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. de Vere) be added to the Army before Sebastopol Committee. On consultation, however, with the Committee the result was, that they wished him to state to the House, as a conclusion to which they had unanimously come, that in their opinion it would be better if no further additions were made to the Committee. ("Oh, oh!" and laughter.) He really could not see what there was in that announcement to elicit the laughter of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He could take upon himself to state that the members of the Committee had been extremely sedulous in their attention to business, having only on one occasion failed to make a Committee. As yet there had been no difference of opinion amongst them, and they regarded the discussion which had taken place in that House as tending to injure them in their judicial capacity before the country. They thought that they could best conduct the inquiry without any further addition to their numbers, while, at the same time, they would advantage the public service by putting an end to discussions that interfered with the discharge of their duties. He could only add, that he had mentioned the decision of the Committee to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and he had acceded to their views; it was, therefore, not his intention to propose any one to fill the place on the Committee vacated by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. J. Ball.)

MR. BENTINCK said, he certainly was not surprised, after the discussion of a former evening, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had thought proper to withdraw his motion. With all respect, however, for the opinion of the Committee, as just enunciated by the hon. and learned Gentleman, he must say he regretted exceedingly that it was not in his power to coincide with it. In making that remark he begged to say that he intended to impugn neither collectively nor individually the conduct of the committee. But having on a former occasion contended—and contended with the concurrence of opinion of at least a large minority in that House—that considering the subjects which were being discussed before the Committee, it was indispensable that at least one Member of it should be connected with the naval profession who might cross-examine closely and efficiently a great number of the witnesses necessarily produced before the Committee—many of whom trying to save their own reputation, would be bent on trying to conceal the truth. Now he would defy even the acuteness of the hon. and learned Gentleman himself to extract the truth from an unwilling witness of that description. He could only express his surprise that the independent advocate of investigation into abuses and mal-administration of affairs at the seat of war should have thought it necessary to refer upon all occasions of doubt for advice to the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government. He, however, repudiated the principle laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman; for he contended that the nomination of the Committee ought to rest entirely with the House of Commons, and ought not to be dependent upon arrangements made behind Mr. Speaker's Chair. All such hole-and-corner work was most unseemly and irregular in reference to a subject like that before the Committee. He was informed that up to the present time a very small portion of the inquiry connected with the transport service had been gone into, and he submitted to the House, whether this did not materially strengthen his argument as to the necessity of having upon this Committee a naval officer of experience in that House—and of experience in his profession. Such an officer he now proposed in the person of Captain Gladstone, and he thought the noble Lord opposite, if he systematically persevered to prevent the appointment of the only description of man who could by possibility sift the truth on one important branch of inquiry, would lead the country to believe that the object of the Government was not to promote but to stifle investigation.

MR. MACARTNEY seconded the motion. Motion made and Question proposed, "That Captain Gladstone be added to the Committee."

LORD SEYMOUR said, as one of the members of the Committee he rose to state the reasons why he thought there was no necessity for any additional member in the room of the hon. Member for Carlow. They had been inquiring consecutively for a great number of days, they had published a blue book in which there were given 13,000 questions, and they had asked some thousands more questions, and there was a very voluminous appendix. Should any new member be appointed to the Committee, in order to put himself in the same position as the other members it would be but reasonable to require him to go carefully through all those questions and evidence, so as to enable him to go on with the inquiry. In coming to a decision upon the matter, it was most important that no party feelings should be excited. He had not taken part in the discussion in that House with respect to the members to serve on the Committee, nor should he then if he had not been asked to do so. The Committee unanimously agreed that if a new member came in he should make himself acquainted with all the evidence which had already been obtained; and it was evident that even when a member came in after a few hours' absence he had to ask many questions, and the previous examination had to be repeated to him, and thus much time was consumed. Should the House think that all these questions were material, and should they decide to run the risk of having all these questions put again, they must not complain if the inquiry should be thereby protracted. It was the general opinion that the inquiry should be brought to a conclusion in a reasonable time; but should the Committee be forced to go over again the same questions, he could not answer for the period when their decision would be arrived at. He would dislike to divide on a question whether any particular member should be added to the Committee, but the Committee considered that they did not require another member. There were ten members present every day, and no party question had arisen. If the House wished to impair the efficiency of the Committee, nothing could do it more than a party division in the House in respect to it.

MR. LIDDELL said, he agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Seymour) that this inquiry ought to be brought to a close as speedily as possible. However, the great reason adduced for making no further additions to the Committee was that the new member or members could not have been expected to have made themselves masters of all the evidence. Now he begged to remind the House that that was an argument which might have held quite as good on Friday night, when there was the question of the appointment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. de Vere). It seemed that there had been a kind of agreement in this matter between the Chairman of the Committee and the noble Lord at the head of the Government. He had hitherto considered the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) as an independent Member, but after the proceedings of that night he must confess that his faith in him was shaken. He had thought that it was a question of the country against the Government, but now it appeared to be entirely between the Committee and the Government. He deprecated anything like a factious feeling upon this subject. The country wanted a strict and searching inquiry. The Committee had to deal with naval questions, and he should in consequence vote for the appointment of a naval officer.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he would admit that the argument was equally good on Friday night against the accession of a new member, but it was not the Committee that moved for that accession. The argument of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Liddell) therefore went against himself. The Committee never asked for the appointment of another member [MR. LIDDELL: The Government did.] If the hon. Gentleman thought that he had gone into that Committee with a foregone conclusion of drawing up a bill of indictment against the Government, he had mistaken his man. More factious and dishonourable motives could not be imputed to any man than to say that they had been packed, or that it was intended to pack them, not for the purpose of investigating the truth, but for the purpose of trying a foregone conclusion. Every member who was old enough to have cut his wisdom teeth in that House must be perfectly well aware that no Committee was ever formed without consulting the heads of parties. With regard to the necessity of a naval officer being on the Committee, he did not see the necessity for it, as all the Committee had to inquire into was to ascertain if the naval officers obeyed their orders. At the present stage of the proceedings he certainly thought it would be rather a disadvantage to appoint a new member on the Committee. It was clear that if they were to have a Gentleman on the Committee who knew nothing and who had not read these 14,300 questions which had been asked, the report of the Committee must be delayed a considerable time.

MR. PACK said, that the House could only judge of the opinion of the Committee on Friday night from the motion which stood in the name of its Chairman, and which proposed the appointment of a new member. He believed that a naval member was wanted on the Committee, and he should therefore support the motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he wished to say a few words in consequence of the way in which the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had represented the agreement with respect to the appointment of the Committee, totally forgetful of the ordinary course of proceeding in that House. The hon. Gentleman said that the Committee should be appointed by the House and not by the Government; and so it was, for it was the House which appointed the Committee. If the course suggested by the hon. Gentleman were followed, what would be the consequence? The hon. Gentleman wished that when a member desired to appoint a Committee he should without communication with any one, propose a certain list of names. If that were done, there would be a long debate upon every name proposed, and there would be no end to the proceeding. The only method of coming to a conclusion was, that the person who proposed the Committee should consult with the leading Members upon the different sides of the House, and should come to an understanding upon a list of names which should be unobjectionable to any party, and which should yet command the confidence of the House. The course which had been pursued by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck) with regard to the Committee was that which was invariably and necessarily pursued in the appointment of every Committee which was ever named in that House for any useful purpose. In reference to the present question, all that he wished to say was that his hon. and learned Friend had stated to him that evening that the Committee had unanimously come to the decision that they preferred not to have any new member added to the Committee. So far as the Government were concerned, it was a matter of perfect indifference whether a member were added or not; and, moreover, they had not the slightest objection, if a member were to be added, that that member should be a naval officer. He felt, however, that some deference was due to the opinion of the Committee, which appeared to be unanimous; and he should therefore vote with his hon. and learned Friend if the motion went to a division; but he assured the House that it was a matter of perfect indifference to him whether the motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite were carried or not. He was quite sure if the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Gladstone) were appointed that he would discharge his duty with satisfaction to the country.

Mr. DISRAELI said, he entirely agreed with the noble Lord in the observations which he had made with respect to the system followed by the House in the mode of appointing Select Committees, and he thought that the Government might very well be acquitted of any sinister purpose in the mode in which they sanctioned the appointment of such Committees; for nothing could be more natural, fair, or convenient, than for a Member on moving a Committee, to place himself in communication with the leaders of different parties in the House, in order to ascertain who would be best qualified to inquire into the particular subject-matter at issue. It was an object of great importance to have upon the Committee the most competent men who could be procured, and persons who possessed the confidence of the country. With regard to himself personally, any influence he had exercised in the appointment of the Committee had been this. He was not consulted in the appointment of the Committee, as he would probably have been, had the Committee been nominated upon that side of the House, but the appointment of the Members of the Committee was left with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), and the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had, however, with great courtesy, done him the honour of asking his opinion upon the nomination of a certain number of Gentlemen to represent the general feelings of Gentlemen who sat upon that side of the House, and who had voted with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield in favour of the inquiry. In alluding to the matter he wished to remove from the public mind, and from the House generally, any idea that there had been a party feeling with regard to the appointment of the Committee. The only part he had taken upon the subject was this:—The hon. and learned Gentleman asked him to recommend four Members to sit upon the Committee; and, as the names of any Members he might recommend would have to come before the House for their approval, any recommendation which might be considered unjustifiable, or to misrepresent the feelings of the House, could easily have been set aside. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had done him (Mr. Disraeli) the honour of placing his name upon the Committee, but particular reasons with regard to the pressure of public business induced him to believe that he was unable to do proper justice to the subject, and therefore he recommended that his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) should sit upon the Committee in his place. He felt that in making that recommendation he was taking a course which would give satisfaction to a great majority of hon. Members. And who was the second Member whom he had recommended? Having observed that the name of the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard) did not appear among the names proposed either by the Government or by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, he thought that the public would not feel satisfied unless the hon. Member for Aylesbury formed part of the Committee, and, as all that was required was an investigation into the subject by those most competent to carry on the inquiry, he said that he should wish to see the name of the hon. Member for Aylesbury upon the Committee. Having proposed these names, he felt that there ought to be upon the Committee both a military and a naval man, and he therefore recommended the names of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wigan (Colonel Lindsay), and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Christchurch (Admiral Walcott). The names of these Gentlemen were, however, omitted in the Motion brought before the House, and no naval officer whatever was nominated. A strong feeling being entertained that a Member of the naval profession should occupy a seat in the Committee, he was consulted upon the subject by hon. Gentlemen who sat upon that side of the House, and the name of a Member of the Royal Navy was mentioned, to whom the only objection he could urge was, that from the general arrangement of the Committee, the Government having lost a Member, it might be considered that they were trying to obtain an unfair advantage if they recommended a Gentleman from that side of the House. He therefore had not supported the proposition, but he subsequently supported the nomination of an hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Scobell) from the other side of the House. He only went into these details to show that there was no desire whatever to give this Committee a party character, and that the only wish was to have efficient Members serving on it, whose labours should command the confidence of the House and the country. If it could be supposed that they were deviating from the understanding originally entered into with regard to the general balance of party interests in the Committee, he certainly should have avoided voting for any Gentleman at all. But when the noble Lord at the head of the Government sanctioned, the other night, the nomination of a Gentleman whose name was unknown to ninety-nine out of every hundred Members, he should, if he had been present, have expressed an opinion that the noble Lord ought to propose for the adoption of the House the name of a Gentleman better known and of more experience. There could, however, be no question that all parties were now entirely free to take that part with regard to the present vacancy which they thought best calculated to promote the public interests. The noble Lord could not urge that he in fairness ought to recommend an hon. Gentleman to fill the vacancy, for the noble Lord plainly told them that he did not value the appointment, and had no desire to nominate a Member of the Committee. But, though the noble Lord did not value the matter, the question was a serious one for the consideration of the House. Having well weighed the number to be appointed upon the Committee, and the character and talents of the Gentlemen appointed, they ought to hesitate before they gave to the Committee, or to any Minister, the power of diminishing the number of Gentlemen to whom such highly important functions had been delegated. If such a proceeding were allowed, it might be in the power of the Government to reduce the number of the Committee, by giving places to certain of the Members composing it. The noble Lord said, it was a matter of perfect indifference to him whether this or that, or no Gentleman at all, were appointed upon the Committee; but he (Mr. Disraeli) considered that the Members of the Committee were fulfilling some of the most important and responsible duties ever delegated to a Committee, and no Minister of the Crown had a right to use the language which had been used by the noble Lord on the present occasion. The noble Lord had spoken of the Committee with contempt. [“No, no!”] Had not the noble Lord said, within the last few minutes, that it was of no consequence who the particular individual was who should occupy the vacant post, or whether any Member at all was added to the Committee? Were not the Members of the Committee performing judicial functions? In the opinion of the people of England, they were fulfilling more important duties than had been fulfilled for many a long year; and was the House of Commons to be told that it was a matter of no importance to the First Minister of the Crown whether a particular individual was chosen, and that, in point of fact, it was an insignificant matter whether the number should be kept up or not? He might as well say it was a matter of insignificance whether the number of the Judges should be kept up, for the present inquiry, so far from being a matter of indifference, was a subject of the highest importance. The gravest duty they could fulfil was to appoint a competent and worthy Member of that Committee in lieu of that Gentleman who, by the agency of the Minister himself, had left that solemn tribunal, on whose verdict more perhaps depended than either the House or the country had yet taught themselves to believe. It was, therefore, of the highest consequence that they should take care not only that the number should be complete, but that the Members of the Committee should be competent. The remaining question, was, whether there ought not to have been upon this Committee to inquire into the state of the army before Sebastopol, a Member of the House who was also a Member of the naval profession. If such a man had been proposed from the other side of the House, he would have supported him in preference to any Gentleman who sat upon the benches near him, for the very reason which had been thrown into their teeth—that they ought not to admit the imputation of party feeling in the appointment of the Committee. He did not think it fair to impute any such feeling to his hon. Friend (Mr. Bentinck), who had shown by his Motion that he did not seek to infuse party spirit into its composition. They had not succeeded in appointing a zealous supporter of the Minister, and an able and gallant officer, and why? Because the noble Lord at the head of the Government opposed it. The noble Lord had shown his respect for his supporters by refusing to grant the fulfilment of their wishes, and now he said it was a matter of indifference to him who was appointed, or whether any one was appointed at all. It was much to be regretted he did not express that sentiment on Friday night; he would have saved a world of discussion, for the noble Lord might then have listened to the suggestion of his (Mr. Disraeli's) hon. Friend (Mr. Bentinck), who had now proposed an hon. and gallant

Gentleman, who was not a partisan, but who was a relative of a right hon. Gentleman who was Minister when some of the most important transactions to be inquired into occurred, and who, though not now a Minister, was still responsible to the Parliament. This was not a proposal to be tortured and perverted by the ingenuity of rhetoric into a party movement; on the contrary, it was one that was recommended to the House by the most weighty reasons; it was one most conducive to the public service, and would bring the intelligence and experience of a man of character, ability, and professional knowledge to bear upon the question. He did hope that his hon. Friend who had with so much perseverance, in the face of great difficulties, brought this question again before the House, would triumph to-night, and that they would appoint upon the Committee on the army before Sebastopol, a man able to go into the whole question connected with the transport of our troops and stores to the seat of war.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire might have spared upon this occasion much of his vehement rhetoric. The right hon. Gentleman, referring to the answer given by his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) to the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), had, after fairly stating the principles upon which a Committee ought to be constituted, endeavoured, by misrepresentation, to lead the House and the public to suppose that his noble Friend had spoken with levity of the Committee and expressed his indifference to its composition. He (Sir G. Grey) could only say that nothing could be further from the truth. His noble Friend, in speaking with reference to the particular vacancy occasioned by the appointment of his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of the Colonies, had, in answer to the reproach cast on the Government by the hon. Member for West Norfolk, that he had entered into a compact with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield to conceal something that ought to be inquired into, said that he was perfectly indifferent to the Committee in that sense, and that his only wish was that it should be conducted in the manner which would best attain its object. But the right hon. Gentleman, not satisfied with sneering at the noble Lord, attacked the Committee itself, and denounced it as unparliamentary, because, in a unanimous Resolution, it had determined that, in the present advanced stage of the inquiry, which was of a judicial character, it did not think it would add to its efficiency or be consistent with its objects that a new member should be appointed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) was a member of that Committee, and agreed, as he (Sir G. Grey) understood, to that Resolution, and now the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, who told them he was not animated by party feeling, though he could not help thinking the matter originated in party feeling, denounced the conduct of the noble Lord, and intimated that the proceeding of the Committee in agreeing to such a Resolution was not altogether satisfactory. He (Sir G. Grey) repeated that the Government had nothing to conceal in this matter, their object being only that the inquiry should be fully and fairly conducted, and he still thought, in deference to the Committee, who ought to be the best judges of the matter, that it was most undesirable to add a new member at this stage of the inquiry, though personally he had not the slightest objection to the appointment of the hon. and gallant Member for Devizes (Captain Gladstone).

MR. WHITESIDE said, the right hon. Baronet who had last addressed them appeared offended because his (Mr. Whiteside's) right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) had spoken his mind plainly on the subject, the importance of which no one could deny. They all knew that the noble Lord at the head of the Government struggled with the greatest ability against the appointment of the Committee itself, afterwards that he took an active part in the choice of the members, rejecting some and suggesting others; and yet the House were to be told that it was quite constitutional for a Minister to create a number of place-men, and reduce the Committee by taking away its members. The same principle might induce him to take away two, three, or four. The noble Lord had prevented the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. J. Ball) from hearing the whole of the evidence and giving a judgment on it, and now he said no other member should be appointed on the Committee, because he would not have heard that evidence. He (Mr. Whiteside) always listened to the noble Lord with admiration, but sometimes with regret. The noble Lord had opposed the appointment of the hon. and gallant officer (Captain Scobell) because he thought it desirable that there should be an Irish Representative on the Committee, and now he proceeded to remove from it the very member who represented Ireland. The blood of his countrymen had been lavishly shed in the Crimea, and the inquiry into the cause of the calamities that had occurred was one of great importance. The noble Lord said, however, that, as the House of Commons did not choose to appoint an Irishman on the Committee, they ought not to appoint any member—English, Irish, or Scotch. He thought the inconsistency of the noble Lord was most evident. He (Mr. Whiteside) had heard that the affair had been arranged and managed, and that the noble Lord, finding that public opinion was adverse to his conduct on Friday night—that public opinion having previously shattered the Government of which he was a member upon this very question—endeavoured to get out of the difficulty by saying that it was not a matter of the least consequence to him whether a naval man who on Friday was so unfit to be appointed should be placed on the Committee, or whether an Irishman, whom on Friday he thought so fit for the position, should be appointed. He (Mr. Whiteside) hoped the House would maintain the Committee in its integrity and independence, and, for his own part, he did not think they could select a more worthy, a more competent, or a better qualified man to serve upon it than the Gentleman whose name had been proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Bentinck).

MR. ROEBUCK said, that, as some imputations had been thrown upon him, he hoped he might be allowed to trouble the House with a very short explanation. Although he might subject himself to further imputations by the statement he was about to make, he thought it due to the noble Lord at the head of the Government to say, that he had nothing whatever to do with the recommendation of the Committee. That recommendation was made, if he recollects rightly, by the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington); and when the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) came down to the House that evening, he (Mr. Roebuck) communicated to him the opinion of the Committee. The violent harangues of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite were, therefore, altogether unfounded, for he had never consulted with the noble Lord on the subject. The right hon. Member for Droitwich had proposed that he (Mr. Roebuck) should be commissioned on the part of the Committee to state their opinion to the noble Lord, and he did so when he saw the noble Lord in the House. The hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) had said that up to that time he had regarded him (Mr. Roebuck) as an independent Member of the House. The hon. Member insinuated that he (Mr. Roebuck) was in that painful position of having his confidence withdrawn from him. He could assure the hon. Member for South Northumberland that that painful position he would endeavour to bear. He thought this was a matter entirely for the judgment of the House. The Committee had hitherto done what they conceived to be their duty; if he knew anything of the members of the Committee he was satisfied they would continue to do their duty; but if the House thought fit to add to the Committee an hon. Member who was the brother of one of the parties accused, although he might think it a singular decision, he could have no objection to the proceeding.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he thought the country would have some difficulty in understanding why it was that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee came down on Friday ready to sanction the prospective appointment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. de Vere) as a member of the Committee, while he stated to-night that the Committee were averse to the addition of any new member. He thought the country would be unable to understand the indifference of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) on this subject to-night, and his great anxiety on Friday night to have Ireland represented on the Committee. If the Government were ready now to assent to the appointment of a naval officer upon the Committee, how was it that they so strenuously resisted such an appointment on Friday? The noble Lord's anxiety to have an Irishman on the Committee seemed to have entirely evaporated, and, with his characteristic jauntiness, he expressed his perfect indifference whether Ireland was represented on the Committee or not. The Committee had yet to inquire into very important matters. They had not only to ascertain what was the condition of our army in January, but what was its condition at the present time; what the new Whig Ministers had effected for its improvement; what had been done by Lord Panmure to increase the number of bayonets, the force of cavalry, or the efficiency of the transport service. He thought the noble Lord at the head of the War Department ought to be called before the Committee to satisfy them whether the country had really gained anything by the change of Ministry. He considered that such an inquiry should not be prosecuted by men who were placed upon the Committee by the Government, or who expected favours from the Government. He voted on Friday against the appointment of the hon. Member for Limerick, as he had done against that of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. J. Ball), because he anticipated what would happen. He knew what was the goal to which the hon. Member for Carlow was looking. He knew the hon. Gentleman was just the man whose services would be valuable to the Government, and that they would show their gratitude to him on the first fitting occasion. As an Irish Member, he (Mr. Maguire) must express his regret at the utter indifference which the noble Lord had manifested to-night with respect to the representation of Ireland on the Committee.

MR. BENTINCK, in reply, said, that the noble Lord, in alluding to the remarks he (Mr. Bentinck) had made as to the manner in which the Committee had been formed, seemed to forget that he had distinctly stated that, however the custom of the House might apply with advantage under ordinary circumstances, he considered that the circumstances under which this Committee was appointed were so exceptional, that what might be a good rule in other cases might, in this instance, be objectionable. The noble Lord had stated that he was quite indifferent whether the hon. and gallant Member whose name had been proposed was appointed a member of the Committee or not. The greater part of the inquiry respecting the transport service was yet to take place, and, therefore, the necessity for a naval officer on the Committee was as great as at the commencement.

The House was about to divide, when MR. ROEBUCK rose, and said, he had no wish to divide the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, if the Chairman of the Committee had no objection to the Motion, he had none either. Thus far he was ready to show the extent of his indifference.

Question put, and agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, April 24, 1855.

THE CONFERENCES AT VIENNA.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY : My Lords, I last night gave notice to my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, that I should this evening put some questions to him with regard to the state of the negotiations which have been hitherto going on at Vienna. My noble Friend, I am sure, will give not only myself, but every Member of this House, credit for having abstained for a considerable period from embarrassing Her Majesty's Government by any questions relating to this subject, inasmuch as I am sure we all felt the immense importance of the measures which were proceeding, and all indulged in an earnest hope that they might be concluded by an honourable and lasting peace. But, my Lords, yesterday the impression upon the public mind was that all hope in that respect had ceased, that the negotiations were broken off, and that we were now threatened with a campaign for a second time against Russia. It is my wish, therefore, to ask those questions of the noble Earl which I think are not premature; and, indeed, I find that in another place I have been anticipated by a Member of Parliament, and that the Prime Minister has announced to the House of Commons what the state of the negotiations now is. It appears by a statement made by Lord Palmerston in the other House—if I may be allowed to refer to it—that there is no longer any hope that Russia will be induced to accept certain propositions which have been made by the Western Powers, and which, as I understand, were supported by Austria. It appears from his statement, that the Western Powers, supported by Austria, proposed to negotiate on the Four Points, which your Lordships will recollect were laid down as long ago, I believe, as the 8th of August, as the basis of negotiations for procuring peace. Your Lordships will recollect that the Four Points were founded upon the following principles : The first related to the protectorate of the provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia. It was insisted upon by the Western Powers that there should be a protectorate of those provinces by the Five

Powers instead of by Russia alone as heretofore. The second point was that which related to the freedom of the Danube; and the third, as explained by my noble Friend opposite and the French Minister (M. Drouyn de Lhuys), was intended to reduce the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea. The fourth and last point involved the principle of the protection of the Christian religion and the Christians in the Ottoman Empire, by a general protectorate of the Five Powers, which should preserve them from all interference by the Government with their religious privileges. I naturally conclude, though I do not know it to be the fact, that at Vienna the Conference began with the first point; and I will ask my noble Friend whether Russia, entering into the views of the Western Powers and of Austria, in respect to that point, agreed to it? I would also ask whether, in regard to the second point, concerning the freedom of the Danube, my noble Friend met with any difficulties on that from Russia? I understand from the speech of the Prime Minister, to which I alluded, that it was on the third point that the negotiations were broken off. It appears from the noble Lord's statement, as reported, that the propositions made to Russia consisted of two alternatives—that the Plenipotentiaries of England, France, Austria, and Turkey proposed to the representative of Russia that the mode of reducing the preponderance in the Black Sea should be either that the amount of the Russian naval force in the Black Sea should henceforth be limited by treaty, or that the Black Sea should be declared an entirely neutral sea, and all ships of war should be excluded from it, so that it should be a sea of commerce only. These are the two alternatives which were offered to the Russian Government, and Russia refused both, and made no counter-propositions whatever. Now, the propositions having been made and refused, we are unavoidably involved in what may perhaps be a war for many years. But I must be allowed to say that, though I deeply regret that some means have not been found for insuring an honourable and lasting peace for this country, that regret is very much diminished when I look at the terms of the proposition, such as they have been represented. With respect to the second alternative—that of making the Black Sea a sea of general neutrality without any armed vessels in it, except such as are necessary to guard commerce from pirates, that is, perhaps, a proposition of rather too Utopian a view, but still it is preferable, and has a better chance of success with respect to our wishes hereafter than the first alternative. I cannot conceive that the first alternative proceeded either from my noble Friend opposite or the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government. I cannot but think that it was an Austrian proposition. That alternative recommended a limitation of the Russian fleet in the Black Sea. If that proposition were made simply and nakedly, as stated in the course of my noble Friend's speech, I cannot understand what possible guarantee we could have had for the observance of that arrangement. If it had been accompanied by a proposition that each of the Five Powers should have a certain limited number of ships in the Black Sea as well as Russia, then I can conceive that the treaty might have proved effective; but I cannot conceive any material guarantee which my noble Friend could have for the continuance of the peace or the observance of the treaty. Even supposing that we limited by treaty the number of vessels which Russia should have at Sebastopol and other ports in the Black Sea, does any one believe that Russia would in the course of a few years abide by the restriction, or refrain from increasing the number of her line-of-battle ships to which she was limited? She would gradually and surely exceed that number; and if our Consuls reported either to the French Government, their own Government, or to the other protective Powers that there was such a breach of the treaty, do you believe that after a few years the country would consider it a casus belli? I do not believe it would; and, therefore, I think you would have no security whatever for the observance of the treaty. It is not on bare suspicion that I say this. Look at the former conduct of Russia with respect to the Danube, the throwing open of the mouths of which was secured by an analogous treaty. But this country did not make the breach of that treaty by her a casus belli. Therefore, so far as these propositions have been made, if they have been made in the naked form represented, without any other conditions attached, I see no reason to regret that Russia did not accept them. I do not enter into the question whether the preponderance of Russia ought or not to be diminished; but I say that eventually it would not have been diminished if she had acceded to this proposition. There is another question which I should like to ask my noble Friend. On the 8th of August, when the Four Points were laid down, Prussia was to be one of the protecting Powers for the provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia. Now, my Lords, considering what the conduct of Prussia has been, which your Lordships heard so well described by my noble and learned Friend behind me (Lord Lyndhurst), the other night, I should like to ask my noble Friend at the head of Foreign Affairs, whether it is now contemplated that Prussia should be included as one of the protecting Powers of the provinces? Because, considering the animus which Prussia has shown during the whole of these important events, it seems clear that, whenever those provinces might find fault with an oppressor, we should be sure to have the vote of Prussia against us. I beg, therefore, to ask my noble Friend whether it is intended that Prussia shall be one of the protective Powers of the Danubian provinces? I think also, my Lords, I am justified in asking my noble Friend whether he does not propose to lay before the House, as soon as possible, much more extended information than he is likely to give in answer to my questions this evening? Your Lordships will recollect that we have had no official correspondence placed before us since the beginning of 1853; neither have we received from my noble Friend any positive information as to the state of the negotiations which have been going on. We have abstained from asking questions on the subject, and he has abstained, with proper official reserve, from laying on the table any documentary evidence as to what has taken place. I think the country has a right to know, now that these negotiations have ceased, and we are going to enter into an expensive, and probably protracted campaign, exactly what we are going to fight for, and what the Government consider the sine qua non in return for the expenditure of so much blood and treasure?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, I fully admit—and I beg to offer my best acknowledgments, not only to my noble friend, but to your Lordships generally, for the forbearance to which my noble friend has alluded, and the desire manifested not to interfere with the negotiations that have been going on for some time past with a view to the establishment of an honourable and lasting peace. I am perfectly ready to admit that my noble friend is by no means premature in asking for the information which he has this night sought. Indeed, had my noble friend not put the question he has, I should have felt it my duty to state to the House the condition at which these negotiations have now arrived. It is perfectly true that the conferences have been adjourned sine die in consequence of the rejection by the Russian plenipotentiary of the proposition for restricting the Russian fleet within the Black Sea within limits which were thought consistent with the safety of Turkey, and also for rendering that sea a neutral sea and one for commercial purposes only. My noble friend has thought right to state, and he has stated to your Lordships correctly, the character of the four points which were the basis of these negotiations. These points were frankly, as was said, accepted by the Russian Government, and the third point contained a proposition for limiting the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea. My noble friend is also right in his assumption that these points were discussed in the order in which he has described them—that to the first and second points Russia acceded, and that they were finally determined. When the third point came under discussion the representatives of the Allied Powers, in order to prove that they had no wish to humiliate Russia, but, on the contrary, desired to consult her dignity, proposed to the Russian representatives themselves to take the initiative as to the means by which they would give effect to the principle of that proposition. The Russian plenipotentiaries acknowledged the courtesy of the proceeding, but asked for time to refer to their Government. That time was given, but in the meanwhile, and for obvious reasons, we declined to go on with the discussion of the fourth point which it was proposed to us that we should do. The answer from St. Petersburg arrived, and it was that the Russian Government had no proposition to make. The allied representatives on the following day brought forward their proposals, and the Russian plenipotentiaries asked forty-eight hours to consider them. That time was also given, and on Saturday last they absolutely rejected the proposals both as to limitation in, and exclusion from, the Black Sea. Whether that rejection of the proposals by the Russian plenipotentiaries was justified by argument I am unable to say, because this meeting took place only on Saturday last, and as we have information of the fact simply by the telegraph, that is all the information we can give at the present moment, except that my noble friend Lord John Russell left Vienna yesterday. With respect to the other point to which my noble friend has alluded—namely, the position which Prussia has occupied in the course of these negotiations, I can only say that the position which Prussia has occupied since the time to which he referred, and which she continues to occupy, entirely excluded her from the Conference, and therefore from all the arrangements that might have been made. With respect to other points to which my noble friend has referred, as to the consequences, for example, that might be expected from the limitation of the power of Russia in the Black Sea, and the manner in which Russia would be bound by stipulations, I think that at this moment it would not be convenient to refer to them, nor until your Lordships are fully in possession of all the information to which you are entitled, and which, I assure you, the Government will be most ready to furnish.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, there was one point on which the noble Earl had not given the House any information—he meant as to the position in which Austria was placed at the present moment. She was placed very much in the position of parties in the other House occasionally, who were ready to play the game either on one side or the other as circumstances might dictate. Her position was, indeed, one of great eminence, dignity, and power having placed herself in possession of two great provinces, with her armies on the frontier of Russia, and in which she might hold language that would enable her to receive the support of France as against Russia on the one side and the support of Russia as against France and England on the other. The country was looking with the deepest anxiety to this point, and he should be glad to know what information the Government now had with respect to the prospects of the war in connection with the part to be played by that great and important Power?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON : I am afraid I cannot give a very distinct answer to the question which my noble friend has put. Your Lordships are well aware of what are the terms of the treaty to which Austria agreed on the 2nd of December last with Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Emperor of the French, and I have no reason to think that Austria will depart from the terms of that agreement. I can only say that on Friday last, Austria appears to have held precisely the same language as the representatives of England, France, and Turkey to the Russian plenipotentiaries, and your Lordships will remember that it is only on peace not being made on the bases laid down in the treaty that Austria is to be called on to concert measures for carrying those stipulations into execution. That time has not yet arrived, and therefore it is quite impossible for me to say what precise course Austria will take.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would remind their Lordships that when he proposed the second reading of this Bill he had agreed, upon the suggestion of his noble Friend the High Steward of the University of Cambridge (Lord Lyndhurst) that the discussion on the principle of the measure should be taken at this stage. Upon the present occasion, therefore, he would lay before their Lordships some of the more prominent features of the measure, and would state what alterations he intended to make in conformity with suggestions he had received, after which he would move that the House should go into Committee pro forma, in order that the Bill might be reprinted. He need scarcely tell their Lordships that the present measure was the result of a Royal Commission issued in the year 1850 to inquire into the discipline, education, and generally into the condition of the University of Cambridge, a similar Commission having been issued with respect to the sister University. The Commissioners made their Report on the 31st of August, 1852; and it was very satisfactory to him to think that in legislating on the present occasion, their Lordships would not have to deal with an unwilling body, but with a body that, in truth, was anxious for their Lordships to confer upon it what they considered the privilege of this legislation. Indeed, if the Bill contained anything offensive to the University it would be an exceedingly ill-deserved return for the exertions which the Report showed it had made during the last half century. Whatever might be the opinion in other respects regarding that learned body—either as regarded its constitution or other matters—it was perfectly impossible for anybody to rise from the perusal of the Report without being satisfied that the University had been most anxious and industrious in its endeavours to fulfil the great objects for which such institutions were designed. It was now far into half a century since he had himself had the honour of being a student at Cambridge, and from that time very great exertions had been made to improve the character of the studies. At that time the University course, as contra-distinguished from the collegiate studies, was made up solely of mathematics. He did not regret that, for he thought that it was most important that such a prominence should be given to mathematical studies; but thirty years ago the authorities, feeling that this was too confined a course, resolved to admit the classics into the cycle of the University studies; and—not confining their honours to those who had distinguished themselves in the mathematical tripos—they also instituted an examination, and conferred honours upon those who should distinguish themselves in classics. As society advanced, however, and as the appetite for knowledge became more diffused, even that enlarged course was felt to be still too restricted; and accordingly within the last five or six years, other branches of learning of a very extended character had been introduced as University studies. Those, therefore, that did not seek for distinction in the higher mathematical or classical rolls of honour were obliged to select either what was called the moral sciences tripos, or the physical sciences tripos. The physical sciences, chemistry, mineralogy, geology, botany, and many others, had been encouraged in the University, and it was still under discussion among themselves whether these could not be further extended. It was almost a doubt with him whether they were not doing too much, rather than too little. He did not propose to dilate on this subject—he was sure that those who had looked at the evidence would see that he was not overstating his case. His Lordship then quoted a passage from the Report of the Commissioners, stating that the University had shown great willingness to enlarge the curriculum of studies, as far as the rigidity of their Statutes would permit, and had been liberal in the administration of their funds, not husbanding them parsimoniously, but bestowing them on objects of great academical importance. A Committee had been also appointed by the Senate some time before the issuing of the Royal Commission, to revise the laws of the University. In legislating on the subject of the University of Cambridge, therefore, it was their bounden duty to consider the sort of body they were going to legislate for; and they should repose confidence in them, because it would be seen from the high testimony borne to the authorities of the University by the Cambridge Commissioners of Inquiry, that they were persons to whom the discharge of their important duties might be safely intrusted. He would now state what it was that he proposed to do by this Bill, stating first what he did not ask their Lordships to interfere with. He thought it would be monstrous to ask their Lordships to attempt to carry into effect all the recommendations of the Commissioners — especially in regard to the studies and discipline. The study and discipline of the University were matters which must be left to be regulated by the University authorities, for it was impossible for the Legislature to interfere safely in such matters. What he proposed that the Legislature should do was to put the University in such a position that they could do all for themselves, which their conduct showed they had been anxious to do, but which their Statutes did not permit them to do. The first matter that would suggest itself to every one was, that inasmuch as in the last Session of Parliament a measure was passed to reform the University of Oxford, that measure should serve for the most part as an example for a measure in relation to the University of Cambridge. To some extent that ought to be so. He thought the kind of reformation that was introduced at Oxford was the kind of reformation that should be introduced at Cambridge; that was to say, the Legislature should constitute a Board of persons likely to be conversant with the subject, and should give to the University and to the Colleges power to do that which of themselves they could not now do, obtaining the sanction of this Board, and afterwards that of the Queen in Council; and if the University neglected to do that in a year and a half which the Board thought ought to be done, then regulations would be made by the Board alone. Accordingly, the first clauses of the Bill provided for the appointment of seven Commissioners, as in the Oxford Bill. The names of six of these he could now state, but he was not in a position to name the seventh. They were the Earl of Burlington, Lord Montagle, the Bishop of Chester, Baron Alderson, Professor Sedgwick, and a Gentleman who was distinguished at Cambridge, the Clerk now sitting at their table, Mr. John Lefevre. The next question was, as to what was to be the form and constitution of the governing body of the University. In considering this, they must not lose sight of the fact, that the object of the University was not legislation. Its object would be entirely defeated if it was to be continually engaged in making laws for itself. But what was important was, that there should be a body of persons appointed to promote the interest of the University including the interest of the public, and who should from time to time be enabled to consider and give their sanction to measures; and those measures being submitted to the Senate, that the Senate might make laws or graces as they were called, which from time to time the interest of the University might seem to require. The latter body was at present inconveniently constituted for any useful purpose. In Cambridge the governing body was the Caput Senatus, which from its composition was most eminently obstructive. The constitution of that body at present was this: the Vice Chancellor named three doctors, one from each faculty, law, physic, and divinity, and also one master of arts of five years' standing, and one under five years' standing. Each proctor did the same thing, so that there were three doctors of law, three doctors of medicine, three doctors of divinity, three masters of arts of five years' standing, and three of less than five years' standing, and then out of these persons so named, the Vice Chancellor and heads of houses selected one of each class, who with the Vice Chancellor formed the Caput; so that the Caput consisted of the Vice Chancellor, of three doctors, one of each faculty, and two masters of arts, all substantially nominated by the Vice Chancellor and the heads of houses. Their functions were defined by the University Statutes; and according to the statute of the 47th of Elizabeth, nothing could be proposed by way of amendment of the law, unless it met with the approbation of every member of the Senate, that was to say, unless it met with the approbation of the Vice Chancellor. It was not his present purpose to inquire whether the powers thus given had ever been abused or not; but their Lordships would admit that, in legislating on this subject, to leave the council of the University thus constituted would be most discreditable. Then the question arose, how was the new Council to be constituted? The Bill did not propose that a new Council should be constituted in the same manner as the Act of last year constituted the new Council at Oxford. The Convocation at Oxford answered to the Senate at Cambridge; that was, all the masters of arts who retained their names on the books were members of the Senate. The Convocation at Oxford was just the same; but at Oxford there had been known, in former times—he believed it had of late fallen into desuetude—a body called the Congregation, that was to say, a portion of the Convocation who were resident in the University, and the Council was elected by the Congregation. He had thought the best mode of constituting the new Council at Cambridge was to constitute it in the same manner as that at Oxford; but, in the first place, they had not at Cambridge any such body as the Congregation. One of two things, therefore must be done, if it was to be elected like the Council at Oxford—either they must begin by first constituting a constituency that was at present unknown, or the election should be by the Senate at large. Now he could not conceive anything less calculated than a general election by the Senate to secure the only object which there ought to be in electing such a body, namely, due attention to academical improvement; on the contrary, he feared there would be a contest to see who could get the most friends to vote for them. Another reason for proposing a different plan was the great preponderance of two colleges at Cambridge over the rest. He found on inquiry that most of their Lordships who had been at the University had been at Oxford and not at Cambridge. Those who had been at Cambridge would know that it was absurd to look at any election to other than two colleges. The Senate of Cambridge consisted in round numbers of not quite 4,500 members. Of these above 1,500 were members of Trinity, and nearly 900 of St. John's. The two together had a great majority over all the rest. He could not of his own recollection name any person who for the last thirty years had been returned to the House of Commons as member for the University of Cambridge, who had not been a member either of Trinity, or of St. John's. There was another reason why this was not the best mode that could be proposed of constituting a managing body to the University. He had stated that in the year 1850 a Commission was issued to inquire into this University. About a year previous, the University itself had constituted a Syndicate, as it was called—a committee to inquire into the best modes of reforming its Statutes. That committee recommended that instead of the Caput Senatus, nominated as it was now, the heads of houses should appoint three members, that the doctors should appoint three, the professors three, and that there should be nominated three non-regent masters of arts, and three regent masters of arts. He had already stated that two colleges had an enormous preponderance, and in order to avoid that influence in the nomination it was proposed that the colleges should have the nomination in turn, according to a cycle constituted by the statute of Elizabeth, called the Statute of Proctors. He thought there should be an intervening body, a sort of filtration, as it were, between the members of the University, and the governing body, and the Syndicate proposed that such a body should be constituted. They proposed three heads of houses, three doctors, three professors, three senior and three junior masters of arts. He had adopted that system with some modification. He had left out the doctors as a class altogether, as they were already practically included in the heads of houses resident in the University. He took four from the heads of houses, four from the professors, four from the senior and four from the junior masters of arts, making sixteen in all. His opinion in favour of this plan had been strengthened by the report of the Commission to which he had referred; he must, however, state that he was surprised yesterday at receiving a communication, just as he was about to take his seat on the woolsack, signed by four of the Commissioners, the substance of which was that they did not think that the expressions made use of in the report authorised him in the proceedings he had taken; but he must also say that he had communicated with others on the subject, and he considered that the measure he was introducing was calculated to meet the views of the Commissioners. When the Commissioners said that they hoped the plan proposed by the Syndicate would soon receive the sanction of the Senate, he certainly thought that that was sufficient indication of their approbation. After their Report was made a petition finding fault with it, signed by forty-three members of the Senate, had been present-ed, but, as this was a very small portion of the Senate he did not pay much attention to the petition. After this Bill was printed he had received communications from many quarters, not quarrelling with the general principle of the Bill, but pointing out the difficulties which would arise in the work-ing of his measure. He had, during the Easter recess, carefully gone through the Bill, and various improvements had sug-gested themselves to his mind, and he hoped their Lordships would pass the Bill through Committee pro forma, so as to enable him to introduce into it the improve-ments which had occurred to him and others, which had been communicated with a view of making the measure more per-fect, and of obviating the objections which had been made to it. One of the provi-sions transferred to the council the powers now possessed by the Caput Senatus. It had been suggested to him that that left the evil altogether unmitigated, as it left the veto in any single member of the Coun-cil—that was not so, but in order to re-move all doubt, he proposed to alter the language and to enact that there should be elected a Council of the Senate, and that immediately after its election thereof it should have the duty of considering all graces, whether proceeding from the indi-vidual members of the Senate, or from the Syndicate. Thus, therefore, from time to time there would be appointed from among persons resident in the University, four heads of houses, four of the professors, four of the elder and four junior masters of arts. This was preferable to the constitution of the corresponding body in the Oxford University, which was com-posed of the heads of houses, six profes-sors, and six masters of arts, all of whom must be of five years' standing. The inter-ests of knowledge would be advanced, not by giving the government of the Uni-versity to young men, but by stipulating that there should always be an infusion of young blood into the governing body, since those younger masters of arts, who were comparatively fresh from their studies would know what the wants of the stu-dents were, and would be able to render valuable assistance in the deliberations of the Council. Another class of enactments worthy of attention were designed to ren-der unnecessary the taking of a large num-ber of oaths that were now imposed in the University, and would therefore make it illegal to administer the oaths that were now taken not to disclose anything relating to the Colleges, or to aid in the promotion of any changes or innovations in their Sta-tutes. These oaths were introduced in an age when a state of feeling prevailed en-tirely inconsistent with that of the present day; and they would, therefore, be repeal-ed by this Bill in the same manner as was done in the case of the Oxford Act. It was also proposed, in conformity with what had been done for Oxford, to authorise the opening of private halls. He should not conceal that the Commissioners had nega-tived this proposition: they thought private halls were not necessary at Cambridge, where the custom already prevailed of per-mitting the students to live in lodgings; indeed, out of 1,760 students, there were about 700 now in lodgings. He did not think the private halls would be much re-sorted to at Cambridge, but the same per-mission ought to be given to parties to open private halls there, if they thought fit, as at Oxford; and as such places would be under the control of the University, he could see no possible harm in it. The Oxford Act provided for the possibility of uniting together several private halls, to make one great hall, but it would not be necessary to specify that in the Cambridge Bill. The clauses which determined the constitution of the Council, and which were the main object of the Bill, did not require much explanation. A very important enact-ment of this Bill was that by which power was given to the colleges and the University to propose any alteration in the distribution and employment of the endow-ed funds, if they could get the sanction of the Commissioners with the consent of the Queen in Council. This extended to the 37th clause of the Bill. Then came a clause, also taken from the Oxford Bill, which rendered it unnecessary to take any oaths or declarations whatever on matricu-lating in the University. All his expe-rience showed that such oaths taken on matriculation, whether religious or political in their character, were perfectly disre-garded, and were, indeed, mischievous; that nobody recollects afterwards what he had sub-scribed; and he presumed that very few of their Lordships would be now able, if they were asked, to answer that ques-tion; and the best way, therefore, was to do away with those oaths and declara-tions altogether. Then came the 40th section which enabled the degree of ba-chelor of arts to be taken—excluding, however, any ecclesiastical advantages—without any oath or declaration, or signing any articles. He did not see, for his own part, why all degrees of arts should not be taken without such conditions, so long as the persons admitted were not invested with any governing power in the University, or with any authority in the Church; but he would not urge the principle to that extent. Having now explained what were the provisions of the Bill, and pointed out why he thought that on the whole the mode of constituting the Council laid down by its clauses was the one best adapted for Cambridge, he would now move that their Lordships should resolve themselves into Committee on this measure, and afford him an opportunity of introducing the alterations he had described.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into Committee on the said Bill.

LORD LYNDHURST: My Lords, I confess, for my own part, that I very much regret that it has been rendered expedient, and even necessary, by recent events, for the Government to introduce this Bill. My noble and learned Friend has stated with great frankness that for several years past the University of Cambridge has been actively and industriously employed in endeavouring to amend its Statutes in order to render them as extensively useful as possible, and that it has only been fettered in the carrying out of that wise resolution by the want of sufficient authority for the purpose; and, my Lords, I had myself thought that it would have been far better to introduce a Bill for the purpose of enabling the University to give effect to and complete its own amendments than to bring in a measure like the present, because it would have been preferable that the University itself should be led to complete its own adaptation to the circumstances of the times, rather than that the task should be entrusted to any foreign authority, however it might be constituted. Still, after what occurred during the last Session of Parliament and the passing of the Oxford Bill, I admit that it would have been difficult, and, perhaps, improper to pursue the course which I have just suggested. It might have created dissatisfaction and jealousy, and perhaps have excited some unpleasant feelings between the two Universities, which had always been united heretofore in the closest friendship, entertaining for each other the greatest respect and esteem. I shall not, therefore, oppose the second reading of this Bill. My Lords, I think that these Universities exert much less influence, and have a far weaker hold upon the public feeling of the country at the present day, than it was their good fortune to possess at a not very distant period. I will not now enter into the causes which have led to this change; but I will merely observe, that when I first entered public life, I found in the other House of Parliament that a majority of the members of that assembly had been educated in one or other of the Universities. Now, however, as I understand, not more than one-sixth, or at most one-fifth, of the representatives of the people have been educated at either of those great institutions. I hear it repeatedly said—and I hear it with great mortification—that the system of instruction at the University is becoming obsolete; that the Universities are behind the age; and that great, essential, and radical changes ought to be made in the system of instruction pursued there, and the mode in which it is carried out. My Lords, I think that there is not the slightest foundation for any such opinion, and I should feel very great regret at finding any essential alteration introduced into the system; for, after giving my best attention to the subject, I am satisfied that no better system of instruction could be established than that which has for ages prevailed, always with due regard to the progress of literature and science from one age to another. Young men enter the University usually between the ages of seventeen and eighteen, and continue thereto about three years and a half. The question is, how that important period in the life of a young man can be best and most profitably employed? It is not the object of the University to cram its students with a wilderness of facts, but its design is of a far different nature—it is to form the character of the young man, and to raise and develop his intellectual and moral faculties to the highest pitch to which his powers are capable of attaining. For that purpose the studies are directed to a cultivation of the taste, to a forming of the judgment, to a strengthening of the most important faculty of attention, to an invigorating of the reasoning powers, and, above all, to an instilling deeply into the minds of the students of the principles of religion and morality. By what course of study is this attempted to be effected? It may be divided into three branches—by the cultivation of classical literature, the study of mathematical science, and instruction in the great principles of morality and religion. When I speak of "classical literature," my Lords, it is not to be supposed that this consists merely of instructing young men to translate a few passages of classical authors. Far different is the course of study which is pursued at the University of Cambridge. The students are taught to read the most eminent authors, poets, philosophers, orators, and historians of ancient times, and to compare them, under the direction of their tutors, with modern writers of the best character upon the same subjects. In that course of study the most striking examples of patriotism and the highest virtues are presented to their mind, and they are taught to admire everything that is great and good. In ancient history they are instructed also in the laws and institutions—religious, military, and political—of the ancients; they are practised in composition, not merely in the ancient languages, but in their own tongue. I confidently submit to your Lordships that no system of study can be better calculated to form the character of a gentleman—and I use the term "gentleman" in its most comprehensive sense. So, also, with regard to the second branch of university education—mathematical science. It must not be supposed that that consists simply of the demonstration of a few problems in Euclid. On the contrary, that branch of science is cultivated to an immense extent in the University of Cambridge—some think to too great an extent; but every one who is acquainted with the subject must feel how strongly that study tends to cultivate the faculty of attention, and to develop the reasoning and reflective powers of the mind. It is not merely to pure mathematical science—geometrical or analytical—that the study is confined; but it extends to all the branches of physical science with which mathematical knowledge is connected—to the science of astronomy, which is founded upon mathematical science; to the laws of fluids; to the laws which regulate our atmosphere; and to the laws of light and heat—all of which are more or less connected with mathematical science. This has a most powerful effect in forming the character of the individual. Last, and most important of all, is the cultivation deeply of the principles of religion and morality. The history of religion is studied, including the principles of our own particular faith, the doctrines which at different times have been inculcated, with the arguments in their favour and against them. And lastly, there is the study of the operations of the human mind, as traced in the works of Locke and kindred writers. Such is an outline of the system of study at Cambridge. I venture to submit that no system of instruction could be better calculated for preparing a young man to enter upon his career of life, whatever it may be, whether the study of the learned professions, of political science, or of literature. But it must not be supposed for a moment that other branches of science are neglected. It is far otherwise. There is a beautiful passage in the Orations of Cicero in which he describes with great eloquence the union and connection between all the different branches of literature and science, forming as it were one family, mutually assisting, supporting, encouraging, illustrating, and adorning each other. In that way the course of study pursued at Cambridge operates; and although it may be proper that young men at the University should study the sciences, yet as the elementary works are easily mastered, and as they call into exercise none of the strong powers of the mind, and do not even require a great strength of memory, I should be extremely sorry that they should in any great degree interfere with or supersede those more solid branches of learning to which I have referred. My Lords, no University has ever produced more distinguished or more extraordinary men than has the University of Cambridge. It gave to the world the great father of inductive philosophy, Bacon, and the immortal Newton. It produced Milton, the sublimest of poets, Spenser, the majestic Dryden, Cowley, Byron, and a long line of illustrious men of our own day. Among men renowned for their knowledge of English jurisprudence whom it numbered among its sons, are the noble names of Coke, of Camden, of Thurlow, and Ellenborough. In the statesmen who sprang from it are the sagacious Burleigh, the brilliant Walpole, and that finished orator and greatest of statesmen, William Pitt. Nor in modern times has it failed to furnish the country with a noble example of a statesman in the person of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne), than whom no one has shown, during his long career as a statesman and a Member of your Lordship's House, more tact, more eloquence, or more sterling good sense. Then again, when I look to the right rev.

benches, I cannot but call to mind the names of those great classical and learned men whom Cambridge has produced—Jeremy Taylor, Bentley, Porson, and a long list to repeat whose names alone would occupy a summer's day. Such, my Lords, is the system of instruction which has been followed at the University of Cambridge, and which, even in old times, produced such glorious fruits. Let us, therefore, be careful how we impair the efficiency of that system by new devices, interfering with that solid system of education which has hitherto been followed by such splendid results. This is one point; perhaps your Lordships will allow me to allude to another and a most important question—I mean the mode by which the system of instruction is conveyed. I do not find in the Bill now before us any specific clause making any alteration in that respect; but, although I find no specific clause, I find sundry provisions which, connecting them with what I have heard, lead me to suppose that very extensive alterations are in contemplation, and therefore a few words upon that subject may be necessary. The present mode consists of instruction by tutors of colleges, by private tutors, and by the lectures of professors. Now, with respect to the system of private tutors, when I went to the University, sixty years ago, very few students had the assistance of private tutors—it was the exception and not the rule. Now, however, I understand that the system has been entirely changed, and that every man who seeks mathematical honours is obliged, as a matter of course, to have a private tutor; nor does it follow that those who obtain the assistance of private tutors are always the most distinguished. I consider that a system which renders it necessary for every one who is competing for mathematical honours to have a private tutor is a very great evil. It leads to a system of cramming which overtasks the faculties and weakens the intellect, and at the same time it places those whose pecuniary resources are not sufficient to enable them to obtain the assistance of a private tutor at a very great disadvantage. I believe that the most distinguished members of the University are desirous, as far as possible, if not to put an end to the system, at least to modify and to limit it. With reference to the mode of education by lectures, some disposition had been shown to extend the professional system, of which I do not at all approve. A young man who hears lectures may easily be under the delusion that he is doing much, whilst he is, in fact, doing very little. He might have attended so many lectures, but his mind would wander, his attention would not always be kept alive, and it was in a passive instead of an active state. Studying in his own room would give much more accurate knowledge than the lectures of a professor, which, however, were not objectionable, and might serve to excite an interest in, and a love of, the subject to be studied. In the third method of education, by the tutors of colleges, I believe there are some defects at Cambridge which this Bill will rectify; but the system is excellent, and I remember that, when I was at college, I found the aid of the mathematical and classical tutors extremely beneficial. Between a student and his private tutor there might be too great an intimacy, so that he would rely upon the tutor to solve every difficulty without exerting his own mind; but the more general explanations afforded by the tutor of the college, who had to superintend the studies of a class, supplied a very advantageous guidance. I observe that some of the clauses of this Bill are copied from the Oxford Bill, and especially that with reference to the establishment of private halls. Now, the great distinction between the system pursued at Oxford and Cambridge is, that at Oxford no student is allowed to live in the town; so that if any one desires to be a Member of Christ Church, and that college is full, he will be obliged to become a member of some other college, whereas at Cambridge the system has been to allow the students to reside in the town, so that if, for instance, any one wishes to become a Member of Trinity College, and it is full, he may nevertheless join it and reside out. It had been asserted, indeed, that such a permission would have a tendency to relax discipline; but he could confidently deny that it had produced any such effect. But I am now told that the establishment of private halls will be of the greatest possible benefit to a poorer and more extended class of students, who, through their means, will have an opportunity of enjoying those advantages of a University education which, in consequence of their limited pecuniary resources, have hitherto been denied to them. My Lords, I do not believe it possible that in any private hall, superintended by a master of arts, who must naturally expect to make a provision for himself out of the establishment, young men can be provided for so cheaply as in their respective colleges, under the present system ; and of course every one would in that case prefer going to the colleges where so many advantages are obtained rather than to these private halls. It has been supposed that the effect of the establishment of these private halls would be, that they would afford facilities for the attendance of the sons of Dissenters at the University. But the heads of these establishments are to be obliged to declare themselves to be members of the Church of England, and I do not believe that the parents of sons dissenting from the Established Church will be willing to send their sons to establishments of this description, where they will be so completely under the control, supervision, and influence of clergymen of the Establishment. I do not therefore see any advantage likely to result from the establishment of these private halls. The sons of Dissenters are, and have been treated with the utmost liberality by the University of Cambridge, and the most beneficial consequences have resulted from this liberality to persons dissenting from the Established Church. I do not, however, object to this part of the Bill, and I do not know that it will do any mischief—on the whole, I believe, that these clauses will be inoperative and a dead letter. I wish to say a few words on the subject of the Syndicate appointed by the University to revise the Statutes. Your Lordships are aware that I have the honour to hold a high office in the University of Cambridge, and I have therefore watched with great interest the attempts made by the authorities to improve the constitution of the University. My noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) told your Lordships that a year before the Commission was thought of the University of Cambridge appointed a Syndicate, consisting of some of the most eminent and learned members of the University, to consider what revision might be necessary in the Statutes of the University. This Syndicate was employed for two years in this important duty, and they recommended the appointment of a Council, the duty of which should be to consider and prepare all graces to be offered to the Senate, the duties of the Caput being limited to the consideration of supplicats and graces for conferring degrees. The Commissioners complimented the University that such a proposal should have emanated from itself, and they say that it was so constructed as to preserve a balance of power among the different colleges, as well as to prevent the excitement and rivalries of a more popular and unlimited mode of appointment. The proposal in question received the unanimous approval of the Syndicate, and when it was brought under the consideration of the Senate, out of 300 Members present only nine opposed it. It is impossible to say that the University has opposed all reform when such a change has been adopted with so little opposition ; but, on the other hand, it was alleged (although this was before the Oxford Bill was brought forward) that, although so large a majority appeared in favour of the Report of the Syndicate, yet the unanimity was founded upon the consideration that the authorities were not likely to obtain anything better. A report was afterwards made in answer to Lord Palmerston's letter to Prince Albert, embodying these and other proposals. It is true that an address signed by certain members of the University was afterwards presented to Lord Palmerston, objecting to the constitution of the Council as proposed by the Syndicate, but, while the proposal of the Syndicate was adopted in a full Senate, only forty-three members of the University thought fit to sign this address to Lord Palmerston. It had been said that the Caput Senatus was elected by the heads of houses, and that the heads of houses so influenced the fellows, that they were in fact the governing power of the University. But no one practically acquainted with the University would assert that to be the case ; and by the proposals of this Bill the influence of heads of houses would be still further diminished by the addition of the masters of arts to the caput. It had also been urged that the governing body should be elected by open voting in the Senate generally ; but what would be the effect of an open vote in the Senate ? His noble and learned Friend had disposed of that question by showing that open voting would allow the two colleges of Trinity and St. John's to govern the University to the exclusion of the influence of all the other colleges. It was the object of the proposals of the Syndicate to guard against the excitements of a system of open voting, and this was one of the grounds upon which their proposal was approved by the Commissioners. What a scene would otherwise be exhibited every year at the time of an election of the Council, for it was upon their election the Government of the University would depend. There would be great excitement and party animosity, which would disturb that calm and tranquil state which is best adapted to the studies of this seat of learning. Your Lordships are no doubt aware that two persons are nominated by the heads of houses every year to fill the office of Vice Chancellor; but they are selected according to a certain rotation, and of the two names sent to the Senate, the first is always accepted, so that practically the heads of houses have no influence in the election of the Vice Chancellor. No recommendation has been made by the Commissioners to alter the mode of electing the Vice Chancellor, and no alteration in the mode of election of the Vice Chancellor at Oxford was made by the Oxford Bill, and there is no reason why any alteration should be made in the plan of electing the Vice Chancellor of Cambridge by this Bill. Well, my Lords, I have now gone through the Bill, and have made such observations upon its provisions as have occurred to me. Future opportunities will be afforded in the course of the discussions in Committee for my making any further observations that may arise to my mind. I have to apologise to your Lordships for having occupied so much of your Lordships' time. But, my Lords, I believe the subject to be one of great importance—certainly of great importance to the University, and I also consider it to be of great importance to the public, affecting as it does the system of education pursued at one of the highest seats of learning in this country. I am glad to have had the opportunity of addressing your Lordships on this occasion. In the observations I have made to your Lordships I feel I have done my duty. In the further progress of the Bill I shall be ready to do everything in my power to make it a perfect measure, both for the interests of the University and for the welfare of this country and of the Church as it is established.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, he had listened with great pleasure to the eloquent speech of the noble and learned Lord, in which he had given so vivid an exposition of the past and present condition of the University of Cambridge. That in former centuries that University was capable of producing men distinguished in the most difficult walks of life the list of names the noble and learned Lord had quoted sufficiently testified; while the notion that the system of the University was antiquated and inadequate to the requirements of the present day was sufficiently refuted by the presence of the noble and learned Lord himself, of whose brilliant powers and commanding talents it was difficult to say whether they had been more remarkably displayed in Westminster Hall, or in the two chambers of the Palace in which their Lordships were then assembled. He was happy that the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, in framing this Bill, while taking for his model the Bill for the University of Oxford, had not observed the same minute interference with the systems of particular colleges which in the early stages of that Bill were attempted. By so acting he believed there was a greater chance of the present Bill passing without undergoing the many alterations and additions which that Bill received. Still there were some points in the measure which required consideration. For instance, it was stated in the interpretation clause that the words "cycle of proctors" should be taken to mean the cycle which had been or might be made by any statute of the University, but those words were not to be found in the whole body of the Act, but were taken from the Oxford Bill. According to the preamble of the Bill, it might be assumed that the necessity of interference with the University on the part of the Legislature was demanded by the inadequate provision made by the University itself for the extension of its usefulness and for the improvement of its system of discipline, studies, and government. But no one could look at the different changes and enlargements of the system of education which had taken place in the University without feeling that those who were particularly engaged in tuition had exercised a most salutary influence over the system from time to time, and that a careful consideration had been given by them to the subject; therefore, there had been in that respect an enlargement of the usefulness of the University. With respect to the founders of the fellowships and scholarships in different colleges, and the control which they exercised over the University by the conditions attached to their endowments, it should be recollect that they were its liberal benefactors, while, on the other hand, the State had done very little for it. The State now, however, came forward with the most arrogant pretensions to deal with the foundations, scholarships, and fellowships of the University; and in the course of the discussions which had taken place on the subject there was no portion of the subject scoffed at more than the founders of those liberal endowments; and the system of education they had directed was charged as proceeding from men of the most bigoted and narrow minds. In numerous other instances which had occurred in recent days, the University had been largely benefited by the liberality of individuals, and particularly by the honours and prizes that had been instituted by means of the gifts of several Chancellors of the University and other public benefactors. Having shown that the University had derived its chief support from the bounty of its founders, without any material assistance from the State, he might ask, what had the State taken from the University? The small stipends of the professors were diminished by fees and taxes, and, more than that, there had actually been imposed a tax on degrees, which of late years had produced from the two Universities nearly 3,000*l.* At the same time exemption from these taxes had been given to the London University, and to the godless colleges in Ireland. By some mysterious process of reasoning, the two ancient Universities had been considered exceptions to the operations of the great dogma of free trade. In another respect the Bill offered a strange anomaly—he referred to the clauses which dealt with the salaries of the Regius Professors—in whom was the patronage of these appointments now to be? They were to be paid by the University; and was the Crown still to appoint professors whom the University was to pay? With respect to carrying out the details of the Bill, whether with reference to the University at large or the colleges, much would depend on the discretion of those persons who were to be appointed Commissioners, and to whom the powers defined in the Bill were to be intrusted; but he would take the liberty to call attention to the fact that the Commissioners, with the exception of the learned Judge, who, as such, could not be considered as a politician, all belonged to one political party, and had the same views, and that, therefore, opinions were not so well blended as in the case of the Oxford Commission. He regretted not to find the name of Lord Lyttelton among them, for he was a distinguished member of the University, and one who had done great good in the cause of education in the county and diocese in which he lived. As regarded the details of the Bill, he concurred in most that had fallen from the noble and learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst). With respect to private halls, he was glad to hear what had fallen from the noble and learned Lord, because the distinction which he had pointed out between the cases of Oxford and Cambridge was one of considerable importance as affecting the position of students. There were other points with regard to which the custom of the two Universities differed, and those ought not to be lost sight of in considering a Bill of this kind. But on one point he could not subscribe to the position laid down by the noble and learned Lord. He believed that anything that would interfere with the free exercise of the students in the choice of their private tutors would be an interference with the efficiency of their studies; for it would often happen that the lectures delivered in a college would not supply all that a student needed to enable him to take honours. He should be very sorry to see any interference in this respect with the liberty of the student, and he rejoiced to see the Commissioners expressing in their Report a decided opinion against prohibiting students from taking advantage of private tuition, if they desired to avail themselves of that convenience.

LORD REDESDALE said, he must congratulate the University of Cambridge on the benefit it had received from the discussion on the Oxford Bill last year; for pretty nearly every amendment which had been carried in the House of Lords and rejected in the House of Commons had been adopted in the present Bill; for instance, he perceived that, with respect to the constitution of the Council, it was proposed in the Cambridge University Bill that the heads of colleges should be nominated by the heads of colleges, and the professors by the professors. The same rule, then, had not been applied to both Universities, but a much larger measure of alteration had been extended to the University of Oxford than to the University of Cambridge. An amendment had been given notice of, which was precisely similar in effect to that which he had proposed in respect to the Oxford Bill, and which was resisted and rejected,—establishing some provision against the perpetual rejection of a measure by certain bodies. He (Lord Redesdale) had ventured to propose, with reference to the Oxford Bill, that if the congregation resisted a measure three times sent down to it by the Hebdomadal Board, then that Board, should have the right of taking the sense of the University at large on the question by proposing it to Convocation. The proposition was rejected ; but he now understood that the noble and learned Lord intended to insert some provision of a similar kind in the present Bill for Cambridge. He had no objection to offer to the Bill, which, on the whole, he trusted would prove a satisfactory settlement of the question, and he was glad to find that it included qualifications and improvements which he and others had not been fortunate enough to secure for the University of Oxford.

VISCOUNT CANNING wished to say a few words after the allusion which had been made to the Oxford Bill, though he was strongly of opinion that the discussion at present, in respect to all that related to matters of detail, had much better be left in the hands of those well acquainted with the University of Cambridge. With reference to the difference of constituency for the election of the Council, he reminded the noble Lord that such a constituency as was created by the Oxford Bill would, in the case of Cambridge, have been liable to be overridden and swamped by the influence of the two predominant, and, if he might say so without offence, overgrown establishments of Trinity and St. John's. Again, though he confessed that he made this admission with some feeling of humiliation, the course pursued by the University of Cambridge, since the first sign of a desire for improvement in the Universities had manifested itself in the public mind, had been somewhat different from that taken from the University of Oxford. So far back as 1837, when the alarm was first sounded in their Lordships' House, and in the other House of Parliament in regard to University reform, their Lordships would, perhaps, remember that on that occasion the University of Oxford, speaking by the mouth of its then illustrious Chancellor in their Lordships' House, gave what was accepted at the time as a very satisfactory and gratifying assurance of the commencement of a course of progress and improvement, from which the best result was anticipated. But, this anticipation not having been fulfilled, the Government felt that it was necessary to take some steps to secure the adoption of the measures which in their opinion were necessary. The manner in which they had dealt with the University of Oxford was unavoidable, in consequence of the apparent unwillingness of the authorities to take any steps in the matter ; and, even after the Oxford Bill had been announced to Parliament, the scheme put forward by the authorities fell far short of the expectations of the Government. The measure of last session was in consequence proposed to Parliament. He thought that a stronger measure of reform was now about to be applied to Cambridge than had been applied to Oxford, but the present Bill would probably be less stringent, imperative, and obligatory in its provisions than the Oxford Bill.

LANCASTER SHOT FACTORY AT WOOLWICH—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, he would beg to ask the hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance whether the building for the Lancaster shot factory at Woolwich was erected by Messrs. Fox and Henderson without the supervision of an officer of the Royal Engineer department ; and, if so, what was the reason for adopting such a course ? also, whether that work has been performed, in respect to construction and materials, to the entire satisfaction of the Ordnance, and whether an officer of the Royal Engineer department has been directed to examine and report upon the same ?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, that in the month of November last, on account of reports that had been received from the East by the Government, it was considered desirable to increase very largely the manufacture of Lancaster shells. He had communicated with Mr. Nasmyth on the subject, who had placed at the disposal of the Government his great works, but, on consultation with the Engineer Department at Woolwich, it was found impossible, in consequence of the absence of certain things, that the work could be carried on in Mr. Nasmyth's factory. They, therefore, found themselves obliged to erect the establishment at Woolwich to which the

hon. and gallant gentleman had alluded. The plans were prepared by the inspector of machinery, in conjunction with Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co. They were submitted to the commanding officer of Royal Engineers at Woolwich, Colonel Foster, who declared that upon the whole, considering the rapidity with which the building had to be erected, he considered the price to be a fair one. The works were accordingly commenced in the course of December, and within a few days afterwards Colonel Foster called upon him and informed him that, in his opinion, if the materials brought upon the ground were used, and if the building were constructed in the way Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co. proposed, it would not stand. But Colonel Foster informed him also that if a guarantee were given by Messrs. Fox and Henderson that the building would stand even for six months, he was quite sure the building might be considered to be a permanent one, in consequence of the great force of the Nasmyth's hammers, and the great amount of machinery that would be set to work from the moment that the works were put in operation. He (Mr. Monsell) accordingly sent to Sir Charles Fox, who gave the guarantee required entirely to Colonel Foster's satisfaction, and the building was proceeded with; and in two months from the day of the commencement the first shell was forged. He might mention that the building covered 3,000 yards, was 240 feet long, and 180 feet broad. The factory had been in operation for some time, and had been working very well; but on account of certain representations made, chiefly with regard to the firebricks, Major General Hardinge, of the Royal Engineers, was requested to go to Woolwich, to inspect the building, and to report upon it. His report was in some respects unsatisfactory, and it was referred to Sir Charles Fox; and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would, when the reply of Sir Charles Fox was received, put another question, he (Mr. Monsell) would be happy to communicate to him the result. All he could then say was, that the building was working perfectly well, that it had stood the severe test to which it was exposed, and, so far as he could learn, the works appeared to answer the purpose for which they were intended. In the first instance the building was to some extent under Colonel Foster's superintendence; but after the guarantee was given by Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co., it ceased to be under Colonel Foster's superintendence, and Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co. having given the guarantee, they had the undivided responsibility of the erection of the building.

INDIAN FINANCE—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish, Sir, to make an inquiry of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control with regard to some financial operations of the Indian Government. The House will, perhaps, recollect that about a year ago a complete conversion of the Indian Five per Cents. was carried into successful operation by the Government of India, and they were converted into Four per Cents. The price of the Five per Cents. at the time of the conversion was 112*l.* in English money, and the conversion was effected at par to Four per Cents. Of course, that was a legitimate operation, or at all events if illegitimate, it was a beneficial one. Now, I understand that, this conversion from Four to Five per Cents having been effected about a year ago, the Indian Government have since opened a new loan of Five per Cents at par. The consequence of that operation has been that the Four per Cents., upon which a loss of 12 per cent by the original conversion from Five to Four per Cents took place, have fallen by the last advices to 85*l.* There is, therefore, of course, a loss of 27*l.* upon them. Wishing to confine myself within the strict limits of the question, I do not intend to offer any remark at present upon this remarkable operation of finance by the Government of India; but I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will lay upon the table of the House any correspondence that has taken place on the subject of this financial operation between the home Government and the Government of India.

MR. VERNON SMITH: Sir, I have to inform the right hon. Gentleman that no official intelligence has been received concerning the transaction mentioned by him. All the information the Government have on the subject is that which is known to him and to the country through the public press—namely, that, in order to raise money for the purpose of defraying the expenses of public works, a loan was opened at 5 per cent. Of course the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the Governor General of India has the power to open a loan whenever he pleases, without consultation with the Court of Directors or the home authorities. But of course he will send home some notice of the transaction; and when the correspondence arrives, I shall be perfectly ready to lay it on the table of the House.

MR. DISRAELI: In consequence of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, which certainly are very unsatisfactory to me. I will, without waiting for that correspondence, take an early opportunity of putting before the House and the country the nature of the operation as I believe it to be, with respect to this loan; so that when the correspondence shall arrive, the House will be better able to appreciate its value.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he would now beg to move, in accordance with the notice he had given, that the House resolve itself into a Committee to consider such clauses of the Act of Uniformity of 1662, as impose religious tests. If the Resolution were adopted, he would introduce a measure to repeal that portion of the Act of Uniformity, by which it was directed that the schoolmaster of public schools should take the affirmation prescribed by the Act of Uniformity. One clause of the Act required every public schoolmaster to sign his conformity to the Church of England, and the result of which was, that they had made every grammar school in the country a Church of England institution. The schoolmasters consequently considered themselves entitled to make all the boys, without exception, learn the Catechism of the Church of England, and attend its service on Sunday. That was, of course, quite agreeable to the members of the Establishment, but was very hard on those boys who happened to be the sons of Dissenting parents, and who were obliged to attend a service in which their parents could not conscientiously join. To remedy the evil he was prepared to adopt the clause proposed by the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) in his Education Bill, by which it was declared that he would not require any child to receive religious instruction to which the parents objected. The question was one that called for the interference of Parliament, and he had the authority of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge for saying that an alteration in the tests at present imposed was highly necessary. One of the first duties of a Representative of the people was to take care that the religious scruples of the people were attended to; and he believed that great advantage would be derived from the appointment of a Committee to consider the subject. One of the earliest reformers in this respect was Lord Bacon; but since the time of Lord Bacon 300 years had passed away, and very little alteration had been effected in the meantime. In the rules of the colleges themselves, which had become national institutions, there were many objectionable religious tests. There could not be a better example of the abuses and malpractices prevailing in the Universities than that of Trinity College, Dublin, the fellows of which had so long been rigidly bent on maintaining the sacramental test. An attempt was made in the Irish Parliament to open that institution in 1793 which was unsuccessful, in spite of the excitement caused by the case of Hearne, who was deprived of a scholarship of the value of 80*l.*, because he refused to take the sacrament according to the rite of the Church of England, being a Roman Catholic. Again, in Trinity College, Cambridge, when a gentleman was appointed to a fellowship, he was obliged to take an oath that he would make theology the end of his studies, and that after the expiration of seven years he would either take holy orders or surrender his fellowship. Many able men professing the Roman Catholic religion, declined to take the Sacrament, and were consequently deprived of their scholarships. He contended that an alteration in the law was called for, and that the House of Commons was the proper body to originate a change. In 1828 the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Lord J. Russell), brought forward a Bill for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. Those Acts were abolished with regard to the magistracy and other individuals, but with regard to the colleges no change was made, and a separate measure was now required to effect an alteration. In most of the grammar schools throughout the kingdom the trustees, in appointing a master, were confined to the election of a graduate from the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, graduates of the other Universities being excluded; but he believed that an institution which selected the best men of the day from all parts of the country was the most likely to advance the interests of the people. We were now arrived at a critical period in the history of the country, when men of talent and ability were more needed than in former times. He called on the House, therefore, to sanction the attempt he now made to set free the educational system of the country, and to affirm the preliminary Resolution he should now lay before them, a Bill founded on which would much tend to the improvement of our educational system.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY seconded the Resolution, feeling, he said, it an honour to be identified with the Dissenters of England in one of the most important movements in the cause of civil and religious liberty which had taken place for the last 200 years.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That this House will resolve itself into a Committee, to consider such Clauses of the Act of Uniformity of 1662, as impose religious tests, limiting the advantages of academical, or grammar, or free school education; and so much of any Regulations of National Institutions, either in England or Ireland, as impose religious tests as conditions or qualifications for any advantages connected with Education, in the English or Irish Universities or Public Schools."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I waited before making any observations upon the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Heywood), because I considered that hon. Gentlemen who are connected with some of those institutions to which the Motion refers might wish to express their sentiments on their behalf to the House. I have, however, no difficulty in at once stating the course which it is my intention to pursue respecting it. The Motion of my hon. Friend seems to me to divide itself into two very distinct and different portions. The first part of the Resolution relates to the consideration of those portions of the Act of Uniformity which require religious tests from schoolmasters and tutors in private families—from persons, in short, from whom generally no religious tests have for a long period been required, and which imposed very severe penalties upon those who neglected to comply with the enactments. The second part of the Resolution, if I properly understand its purport, would appear to me to tend to disturb the settlement which was made last year with regard to the University of Oxford. Now, with regard to the first part of my hon. Friend's Resolution, so far as he has explained it and as I comprehend it, I shall have no sort of difficulty in going along with him. I think these obsolete enactments, which have long ceased to be of any practical effect, and which are no longer in accordance with the spirit of the times, may, with great advantage, be swept away from the Statute Book. With regard to the second part of the proposal, I think it would not be right for Parliament to interfere and disturb the settlement of last year, at all events until we have had some practical experience of the working of that measure. I shall not, therefore, be disposed to go along with my hon. Friend with respect to that part of his Resolution, so far as I understand it. If my hon. Friend should not consent to withhold the doubtful part of his Resolution, and to propose only the first clause, yet, as agreeing with him to some extent, I shall not object to the House going into Committee. I must, however, beg my hon. Friend and the House clearly to understand that, in doing so, it is with the full reservation that I have entire liberty to deal with my hon. Friend's Bill when it is brought in, according to the opinion I may form of the provisions which it contains. I shall be prepared to concur in such portions of my hon. Friend's Bill as will sweep away the old and obsolete enactments to which he has referred, but I shall not be disposed to assent to such portions of the measure as would disturb the arrangement of last year. There may be other points in the Bill which are not included in the Resolution of my hon. Friend, and with regard to them I beg to reserve to myself perfect freedom to consider them when they are explained and developed. I hope, therefore, my hon. Friend will understand, if he persists in leaving his Motion in its present form, that in acquiescing in it I am by no means committed to the full extent of his proposal, but for myself and for Her Majesty's Government I shall be at perfect liberty to object to any portion of the arrangement he suggests, which upon full consideration we may think it is not desirable or expedient to adopt.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the declaration which his noble Friend had just made was, it appeared to him, quite fair and satisfactory, but he went beyond his noble Friend in this respect, that he was disposed to urge upon his hon. Friend the Member for North Lancashire, the expediency of amending his Motion forthwith, because he thought it was neither convenient nor satisfactory that the House should go into Committee upon a matter affecting the Act of Uniformity, not on the proposition of the Government, but upon that of a private Member, in order to allow a Bill to be brought in and read a first and second time, with the view of cutting it down to comparatively insignificant proportions in Committee. He felt bound to give notice distinctly to his hon. Friend the Member for North Lancashire that, so far as the University of Oxford was concerned, after the arrangement of last year, he (Mr. Gladstone) would think it his duty, without the smallest compunction or hesitation, to resist any attempt to interfere with the settlement then made by Parliament. He considered, however, that the omission of the latter part of the Motion would not entirely and satisfactorily attain the object of his noble Friend at the head of the Government, for a clause in the Act of Uniformity, which was in fact a fundamental part of the settlement of last year, limited college offices to members of the Church of England. He thought that any alteration of important Acts of Parliament, which might unsettle the condition of ancient institutions, was a matter of very serious consideration, and that it was most inexpedient and unadvisable that the discussion of such subjects should be renewed year after year. No doubt it appeared a very slight thing to his hon. Friend the Member for North Lancashire to cut out of the Statute Book any measures which were opposed to his views of the manner in which these venerable institutions should be regulated. He (Mr. Gladstone) thought, however, that in the case of institutions so ancient, and possessing so many rights of a complex character, a strong case was requisite to justify the interference of Parliament, and it was especially desirable that such interference should be rare. He considered that his opinion would be borne out by those who recollect that it cost the House the labour of half a Session only last year, to pass a Bill for the reform of the University of Oxford. He considered that in a matter of this kind, those who desired to attain reasonable objects should proceed cautiously and step by step. Commissions had been appointed to inquire, time after time, into the old Universities of the country; they had made their reports; and Parliament had addressed itself with laudable care to the object of applying such parts of their reports as it approved to the case of the University of Oxford. It appeared to him that the recommendation given by his noble Friend at the head of the Government on a former occasion was very wise and sound—that to the Universities all minor establishments for the promotion of education should be made to conform. The system introduced by the Act of last year could not have been established, had not the University, in pursuance of clauses contained in the Act, applied itself with great good faith to carrying into effect the intentions of Parliament, by framing regulations for its better government and discipline. He considered, therefore, that it would be but an ill return for the disposition so dutifully manifested by the University, if, before an opportunity had been afforded to the University authorities of carrying any of the new arrangements into effect, they interfered with a fresh set of Parliamentary stipulations, and threw into confusion the regulations which had already been devised at Oxford. The Universities must be the key to the system of instruction in the public schools; and as Parliament had already passed a Bill with respect to Oxford, as a Bill relating to the University of Cambridge was now before the other House, and as he took it for granted that these measures would be followed by one affecting the University of Dublin, he would call upon them first to fix, by a Vote of that House, the principles applicable to the Universities, and then to consider the principles applicable to the public and grammar schools of the country.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought the most important portion of the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Heywood) referred to the endowed grammar and public schools, and that the House ought not, without careful and mature consideration, to proceed to legislate upon a subject of so much importance. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that, in order to open these schools to Dissenters, the trusts of the endowments would have to be, not qualified or altered merely, but entirely subverted. He therefore asked whether, on the present occasion, the House would sanction a proposal which must necessarily have so gigantic an effect? He trusted the hon. Gentleman would listen to the advice which had been tendered to him, and would consent to alter the terms of his Motion in such a manner as would have the effect of removing those merely obsolete enactments to which the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government had referred.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he had no objection to modify his Motion. The most important and urgent cases were not at Oxford, but at Trinity College, Dublin. For the scholarships there sacramental tests were required, when they were abolished everywhere else. If it would meet the wish of the House, therefore, he would alter the Motion by inserting Trinity College by name, as that was the most important case.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he considered that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) was a satisfactory answer to the speech of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) and afforded the strongest reasons for the rejection of the Motion altogether, because the Motion that the House should go into Committee in order to find out what was the meaning of the hon. Member (Mr. Heywood) was perfectly absurd, and was a most unjustifiable task to be imposed on them. The hon. Gentleman, however, said that he was willing to qualify his Motion provided he were permitted to do something with the University of Dublin. Now, it was a most remarkable fact that that University was the most liberal of any of the Universities of the United Kingdom, and there was extant a speech of Mr. Grattan, which was spoken in 1794, in which that eminent man pronounced a panegyric on the Dublin University as being the most liberal in Europe, because it had permitted the education of Dissenters within its walls fully a century before any other University. He visited the University last week, when he saw a list of scholarships for election, and he asked whether they were to be open to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and the answer was that they were. But what did the hon. Member propose? He proposed that scholarships also should be open to Dissenters; but he did not yet go so far as fellowships. Now, he (Mr. Whiteside) admitted that the Dissenters in Ireland were a very respectable body of men; their language was more moderate than that used by the Dissenters of England—and in which he thought they showed their good sense; but the proposition, that the doubts raised as to the meaning of the hon. Member's Motion should be solved by fastening on the unfortunate University of Dublin and seizing upon its scholarships was one which he did not think even the noble Lord himself would assent to.

MR. HEYWOOD said, that he was willing further to alter his Motion by omitting the latter section, and stopping at the words "religious test." It would then read thus—

MR. DISRAELI said, he thought the hon. Gentleman was committing a mistake in supposing that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had actually assented to the Motion in the qualified terms in which he had proposed to submit it to the House. It was quite clear that the noble Lord did not know what were the intentions and objects of the hon. Gentleman. It was obvious that they were not those indicated by the noble Lord. He (Mr. Disraeli) thought it would be extremely unwise for the House of Commons to go into Committee on a Statute of not less importance than the Act of Uniformity, when absolutely the hon. Member who made that proposal had not indicated to the House in precise language what was his object, and when the First Minister of the Crown, who had sanctioned the Motion, had described it in a manner which proved that he was unacquainted with the intention of its proposer.

MR. HEYWOOD said, he was very sorry that he had been misunderstood. The object he had in view was that boys, not merely belonging to the Church of England, but to other denominations, should be allowed to partake of the advantages of academical or grammar or free school education, without having religious tests forced upon them of a Church to which they did not belong.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, that although but a humble Member of the House, he thought it rather an insult upon his own common sense if he were called upon to vote upon a Motion such as this before it had been explained by its proposer what was the object of it. Upon the suggestion of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), indeed, some alteration had been made in the Motion; but it appeared to him that that alteration was anything but satisfactory. The subject to which it referred was one of the most important with which that House could have to deal, and it appeared to him that the best course the hon. Gentleman could pursue would be to withdraw the Motion, and bring it up again at a future day, when he might be able to explain to the House what he really did mean by his Motion.

MR. HENLEY said, he considered that the Motion would be rendered only the more objectionable by the alteration the hon. Gentleman proposed. It was objectionable enough as it stood originally; but it would be still more so when amended in the manner suggested. Not only would it be useless, but positively mischievous, for the House to go into Committee upon a Resolution framed in such general terms; and if the hon. Gentleman did not withdraw his Motion, he would recommend that it should be met with a direct negative and rejected altogether.

Mr. SERJEANT SHEE said, it appeared to him the hon. Gentleman had done himself injustice in not fully explaining what it was he wished to submit to the Committee. The hon. Gentleman did not read the whole sentence, and by not doing so he seemed to propose that the House should inquire generally into the effect of the Act of 1662 which imposed religious tests. That no doubt would be a very wide inquiry indeed; but that evidently was not what the hon. Gentleman meant. He begged to be permitted to read the first part of the hon. Gentleman's Resolution—

"That this House will resolve itself into a Committee to consider such Clauses of the Act of Uniformity of 1662 as impose religious tests, limiting the advantages of academical or grammar or free school education."

This was what he believed the hon. Gentleman meant to propose to the House. He should like the hon. Gentleman to say whether he did not mean that his amended Motion should read on in the following way—That this House will resolve itself into a Committee, to consider such clauses of the Act of Uniformity of 1662 as impose religious tests, limiting the advantages of academical or grammar or free school education?

MR. HEYWOOD said, he wished to put the Motion in the shape most satisfactory to the House, and was ready to adopt the suggestion of the learned Serjeant. With that view he would beg to be allowed to withdraw the original Motion.

Question put, and negatived.

THE CHARITY COMMISSION.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, that, in bringing forward the Motion of which he had given notice, he had no intention of making an attack on any official, but merely wished to bring before the country the principles of conduct adopted in certain offices. The expenses of the Charity Commission were very great; the last Return showed an expenditure of 78,000*l.* They had, indeed, examined 238 charities, and no doubt a large benefit had accrued to the public, and considerable funds had been rescued from misappropriation. He thought the Commission, instead of any one else, ought to have the appointment of their own secretary and counsel. It appeared that Mr. Hine had been at once secretary to the Commission and solicitor to the Attorney-General, and on his resignation Mr. Fearon was appointed to fill the two offices. As secretary he might advise the Commission to institute a suit, which he would conduct as solicitor. If the Return was granted, the House would see in what manner the suits in this office were conducted. He held in his hand a letter from Mr. Hume, written a short time before his death, in reference to the Hospital of St. Cross. The veteran reformer expressed his opinion that what had occurred was owing to the neglect of the parties conducting the suit, and declared his intention, if again able to enter the House, to move for a Committee to investigate what he believed was a fraud on one hand, and gross neglect on the other. If the Return was granted, they would find the solicitor acting in his professional capacity for both plaintiffs and defendants, and the standing counsel holding a brief first on one side and then on the other. The Commission, therefore, ought to have the appointment of these officers, and it was so provided for by the 38 Geo. III., c. 91. A large amount was now derived by the officers from fees. He thought it would be better for the country to alter the system altogether, and pay them liberal salaries instead. He knew nothing personally of Mr. Fearon, and it was from no feeling of hostility towards him that he brought forward his Motion. He made the Motion solely with a view to elicit information as to what had really been done by the Commission, and as to the manner in which that expenditure had been incurred. He thought there was just reason for complaint as to the amount of fees paid to counsel in many cases.

MR. HADFIELD seconded the Motion.
Motion made, and Question proposed—

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of Treasury or other Order appointing Robert Wray, esquire, Standing Counsel to the Attorney General in Equity Crown matters, or the date when and by whom and under what circumstances he was appointed."

that he did not like to oppose Motions for Returns, but really the Returns asked for by the present Motion was so unprecedented, and would be so voluminous, that he should not feel that he was doing his duty to the House unless he afforded them some information, so as to enable them to see what was asked for. He was sure that the hon. Member who had brought forward this Motion had done so with the utmost innocence and simplicity, and without having the slightest idea of what he (the Attorney General) believed was the case—that he was made neither more nor less than the puppet of a discontented solicitor, who had applied to other Members of the House to bring forward the same Motion, but had failed in the attempt. The Motion of the hon. Member included twenty-two returns, the greater part of which were already on the shelves of the House, while others could only be produced at a cost wholly disproportioned to the value of the information which they would afford. With regard to the first portion of the Returns moved for, it was sufficient to say there were no such orders as those referred to. The counsel in question, who acted as the juniors of the Attorney General in charity matters, were appointed by him. The same reply might be made in the case of the solicitors, who were also appointed by the Attorney General, as it was right and fit they should be, seeing that he was responsible for the manner in which they conducted the business in which they were engaged. With regard to the next Returns, he must inform the House that they were the first of a series of covert attacks on Mr. Fearon, than whom a more valuable officer never conducted the business of a public department in this or any other country. No doubt, a number of ex-officio informations had been filed by the Attorney General without the previous recommendation of the Charity Commissioners; but that was sufficiently accounted for by the fact that there were no Charity Commissioners in existence from 1839, while there were numerous cases in which it was necessary to file informations, and in which they were accordingly filed at the instigation of parties interested in the charities. In the Motion for the other Returns which followed, he could detect the same animus he had already pointed out; while if the information required by others were furnished, it would be exceedingly voluminous and altogether useless, especially as the very information had, in many cases, been already furnished to the House. If the hon. Gentleman thought there was anything wrong in the proceedings of the Attorney General, he ought not to ask for useless and expensive returns, but to move for a Select Committee.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, he deprecated the printing of such a mass of trash as the returns moved for by the hon. Member for Southwark.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT said, after what had fallen from the hon. and learned Attorney General he would not press his Motion.

THE POST OFFICE.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the system under which the Post Office was administered, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the orders given by the Treasury to the Postmaster General, in the year 1848, to establish a Post-office communication, at the expense of his department, between the islands of North and South Uist, Harris, and Barra, should be carried into effect without delay."

In point of fact, the House should bear in mind that the Postmaster General had not perfect control over his own department, but was under the direction of the Secretary to the Treasury, who held in his hands at the same time the patronage of the Post Office, the Customs, and the Excise, and distributed it with the object of gaining political support for the Government. Thus, the head of the Administration, as First Lord of the Treasury, presided over a department engaged in something which fell little short of bribery and corruption. The patronage of the Post Office was distributed not among the deserving clerks and subordinates, but mainly for political purposes; and the administration of the department, with its double system of management, was in every way cumbrous and absurd. The case to which he wished to call the attention of the House furnished an instance of this. Near the coast of Skye were five islands, which contained somewhere about 20,000 inhabitants, and possessed Post Offices established by the Government. Practically, however, the inhabitants of these islands had never received the advantage of the penny postage stamp, for they had been compelled to maintain the packets which conveyed their letters to the islands. In 1848, during the pressure of the famine, the people refused to pay for these packets, which consequently ceased to ply, and all postal communication was cut off. At the request, however, of his constituents, he had waited upon the right hon. Gentleman the then Secretary for the Home Department, and he wrote to the Treasury, who at once consented to bear the expense of these packets. The Government, from that time, undertook to maintain the communication as far as the island of North Uist, but they had never carried it further. The charge thrown upon the poor inhabitants of the islands for keeping up the communication was very heavy, the cost of maintaining the boats being about 80*l.* a year. That sum was raised by subscription, but as many of the inhabitants refused to contribute, the cost was borne by those among them who were unwilling that the postal communication should be altogether interrupted. He did not ask any favour in this case at the hands of Her Majesty's Government, but he contended that those whose cause he urged upon the attention of the House were entitled to be placed, with respect to facilities of postal communication, upon the same footing as any other class of their fellow-subjects. He trusted, therefore, that neither the House nor the Government would suffer the inhabitants of these islands, poor though they were, to be subjected for the future to the inconvenience he had described.

Notice taken, that forty Members were not present; House counted; and forty Members not being present;

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, in moving that this Bill be read a second time this day six months, I hope that, as the subject to which it relates is one which affects some of the nearest relations of social intercourse and domestic life, I may be permitted to trespass for a short time upon the patience of the House. The present House of Commons have never had this subject fairly submitted to them, and I therefore think it will not be unbecoming, nor, perhaps, unprofitable, if I call their attention more particularly to it. By this Bill it is proposed to introduce a law or custom with reference to marriage, different from any which has hitherto prevailed in this country, and as I know there is some confusion, if not inaccuracy, on this part of the subject, I am anxious to press upon the attention of the House how important it is for us to bear in mind that from the earliest times down to the present the prohibition with regard to marriages has been always the same, whether it has been a prohibition relating to marriages on the ground of consanguinity, or on the ground of affinity, both being contracted and both being dissolved by the same law; and, therefore, when any one proposes to make a change in a law of this description, it is incumbent upon those who propose the change to show some strong and urgent reason that would justify us in sanctioning it. In the year 1835, by an Act introduced by Lord Lyndhurst, an alteration, which in my opinion was wise and judicious, was made in the then existing law, and that, I believe, is the only change which has ever been made in the law of marriage from the earliest times. Down to that period all marriages, without exception, that lay within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity were simply voidable; that is to say, they might be set aside by a suit or proceeding in the lifetime of the parties, but could not be voided or set aside if either of the parties were dead. Since 1835 this difference has been made, that all marriages that were voidable before are ipso facto made void to all intents and purposes; but there is no difference in this respect with marriages with a deceased wife's sister or niece, and any other marriage within the prohibited degrees. The present law of marriage, then, having, with the alteration to which I have referred, existed for so long a period, I think that grounds stronger than mere clamour should be established before we agree to change it now. They were called upon now to declare that marriage with a deceased wife's sister or niece was to be lawful in future, but they were not asked to touch any other marriage which is equally prohibited, although they are exactly in pari natura to be the marriage of a woman with her husband's brother or her husband's uncle. What are the feelings of the people of this country with regard to the change now proposed? They are all of them adverse to it. With regard to Scotland, a late Lord Advocate stated to the Commissioners who were appointed to inquire into the subject that the people of that country looked with the greatest abhorrence upon those marriages which it is now proposed to legalise. With regard to Ireland, another witness bore similar testimony before the same Commission, observing with truth that the moral feeling of the people of that country, whether Roman Catholics or Protestants, was opposed to such marriages almost universally. Is it in England then that this change in the law is wished for? Why, the Commissioners in their Report have told you that a large majority of the people of England are equally opposed to those marriages; that the great bulk of the clergy think them wrong; and the House will recollect that the last time this question was raised no fewer than 11,000 of the women of England brought their petition to the foot of the Throne, praying Her Majesty most earnestly, by the feelings which actuate their common sex, not to sanction a change in the law which they firmly believed would be so detrimental to their safety, happiness, and peace. Now, what are the reasons supposed to be urged in favour of this change? The arguments urged in support of the Bill may, I believe, be classed under two heads. The first is that the present prohibition relating to these marriages is an undue restraint upon natural liberty, or, as I think it was called by the hon. Gentleman who introduced the measure, an undue restraint upon religious freedom. The other argument, which embraces almost all the social reasons for the change proposed, is that, by the continuance of the law as it at present stands, you deprive a widowed husband of the means and opportunity of providing for his orphan family the best guardian they can have to replace the mother whom death has deprived them of. In these two propositions I believe may be contained all the arguments ever adduced in favour of this measure; but I think I can satisfy the House that neither of them ought to be sufficient to induce us to make such a change as that proposed. The general answer to these arguments is obvious. In the first place, nothing can be considered an undue restraint upon religious liberty or upon natural liberty if that restraint can be shown to be consonant to the general feeling of moral purity, or if it can be shown to be consonant and agreeable to the general injunctions of religious truth. With reference to the social question, I am willing to concede that in many cases the aunt is the very best of guardians for an orphaned family, but it is for that very reason, and in order that she may be preserved to them as the best of guardians, that I would not turn her into a bad stepmother. These are general answers to the propositions laid down on the other side, but let me now grapple with them a little more closely. The religious part of the question, as far as it assists the change contended for, principally turns upon the construction of a certain disputed verse in the 18th chapter of Leviticus, which, according to our version, runs in these words—"Thou shalt not take a wife to her sister to vex her, in her lifetime." Now the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Heywood) says that this amounts to an express permission, and that, therefore, in the revealed declaration of the will of God such marriages are not only allowed and sanctioned, but even, I believe he would say, encouraged. In reply to this, I should first observe, that the most you can make of such a verse as this is to draw from it an inference—for there is no express permission to contract such marriages either in this or in any other part of the sacred writings. But what is this inference, and what are the consequences which flow from it? The hon. Gentleman says, in effect, that because a man is forbidden to marry the sister of his wife during her lifetime he may, therefore, marry her after his wife is dead. But might no other inference be drawn from this passage? If you choose to conclude from it that a man is only forbidden to marry his wife's sister during the lifetime of his wife, may you not draw another inference equally sound—namely, that he may marry at the same time any other two women provided they were not sisters. The hon. Gentleman would thus, if his reasoning were carried out, involve himself in an enormous difficulty, and, with his philanthropic and benevolent feelings, might be called upon to bring in a Bill next year to enable a person to have any number of wives he pleased. In strict logical reasoning, I am sure the hon. Gentleman cannot get out of this difficulty. Yet as far as we know anything of the Divine will upon the subject of marriages, polygamy, though practised, was never allowed. The revelation of that will is either contained in the original command given to man at the time when marriage was first instituted, which command was ratified and purified by our Saviour's injunctions, or it is explained by the illustrations and examples, which limit our freedom in conformity with that command, within the rules in that chapter of Leviticus to which reference is so often made. Taking either the first or the second authority, I think you will find it is hardly possible to say that these marriages are sanctioned by the law of God. Go to the former, or the Divine command as originally given to man, and confirmed by our Saviour's injunctions afterwards, and then you will find that this command and these injunctions unquestionably determine that they have thrown around the marriage state so deep a mystery, they have given, as it were, so complete a oneness to the marriage union, that those who have vowed to live together as man and wife according to the terms of the Divine appointment must, if there be sense and meaning in words, have also contracted, by force of their union, all the duties, obligations, and sympathies which both of them owe to the themselves and each other, in all the relations and intercourse of life. Well, then, the moment you recognise the principle that a man and his wife are one with each other, the law of God and of nature too, which prohibits the intermarriage of a man with his own sister, must also prohibit the marriage of a man with his wife's sister also. Now, is there anything in the Levitical rules opposed to this view. Far from it. With the single exception of the disputed 18th verse, all the rest is in perfect harmony with the original command. There are altogether thirteen prohibitions enumerated, and out of this number no less than seven are of kindred by marriage, while only six refer to kindred by blood. It follows, therefore, that affinity is placed upon the same footing as consanguinity, and, being so put upon the same footing, the Levitical prohibitions and the original command with reference to marriage at the time of its institution correspond with each other; and consequently you must admit that if a man cannot marry his own sister he cannot marry his wife's sister either, and here it appears that even by the Levitical law, the effect of marriage is to make man and wife so completely one, that the kindred of the husband becomes the kindred of the wife, and vice versa, the kindred of the wife becomes the kindred of the husband. Again, these thirteen enumerated cases are all applied to the male sex only, but nobody will contend that the prohibition depends upon the sex of the parties. If it be incestuous for a man to make a particular marriage, the same kind of marriage under similar circumstances when made by the woman must be incestuous also. Now, follow up this reasoning. In that chapter of Leviticus it is distinctly said that for two brothers to marry the same woman, one after the other, is an abominable thing. Well, if that be so, I want to know why two sisters marrying the same man should not fall within the same condemnation. To that argument I confess I can see no answer, and this is the basis upon which the law of Christendom has been always founded. Jewel observes—and the observation is unanswerable—"When God commands that I shall not marry my brother's wife, it follows directly, by the same rule, that He forbids my marrying my wife's sister, for between one man and two sisters and one woman and two brothers is like analogy." Taking, then, the Levitical illustrations as illustrations of what you may do with reference to marriage, and not as a specific enumeration of the only cases in which you may marry, you must be driven to inference as to certain cases not mentioned in that chapter to see whether the marriage is prohibited or not. There are three rules which may be laid down for our guidance in this matter. The first is, that where you are prohibited in the remoter degree you must of necessity be prohibited in the nearer degree also; the second, that since you are prohibited in cases of consanguinity and affinity alike, you cannot apply the prohibition in the one case only; and the third is, that though these prohibitions are all addressed to one sex, you must transfer and apply them equally to the other as well. These are the reasons which have convinced me that these marriages, of which our sanction is now desired, are contrary to the Divine will. I do not wish, however, to rest my case exclusively upon religious considerations, with regard to which many good and pious men are divided in opinion, although where a doubt exists in a matter of this sort, the safest course is the wisest and the best, and unless there is some overwhelming reason on the other side, it ought to be the one adhered to. Sure I am there is enough to make us pause before we run the risk of doing or sanctioning anything which may, by possibility, be an express violation of the law of God. Leaving, however, the religious part of the question, which has always made a deep impression on my own mind, I will pass now to the social advantages which it is said will be derived by the adoption of this Bill. These advantages may all be included in the one proposition I have before alluded to—that you are giving to a man after the death of his wife an opportunity of providing a good guardian for his motherless children. Will that argument only apply to one side of the question? Does it not equally hold good of the other side? I have shown you already that there are only a few persons in this country, comparatively speaking, who are desirous of this change in the law. May I not ask you to pause, and consider whether there is anything more deceptive (though I believe there is nothing more common) than to draw a general conclusion, which you are now doing, merely from the partial and narrow view of particular instances? It may be true that there are some persons so influenced, either by interest or by passion, as to have broken the law. But is that a reason why the law should be altered, when the great weight of authority and of opinion is against this alteration, and when you learn that multitudes of individuals are healthfully restrained from the commission of that which may be detrimental to other portions of the community? It may be true that some 1,560 cases of marriages of this description were ascertained after a searching and diligent inquiry for eight or nine years throughout the country. But I ask you to consider, if the same search were made in another direction, whether even a larger number of bigamy cases might not be discovered in the United Kingdom, and would you then say, because you found some 1,500 or 2,000 cases of that kind, that therefore it was necessary to alter the law of marriage and allow any man to have two wives? Again, it may be perfectly true that some few persons have gained the advantage of excellent guardians and protectors to their motherless family by intermarrying with their late wives' sisters; but I ask you to consider whether, for every case of that description which can be discovered, you might not find twenty other cases where the widower would prefer that the aunt should be the guardian of the orphan children in the character of an aunt, instead of constraining her by this change in the law either to give up the guardianship alto-ther, or to become their stepmother. This, to my mind, is a most important consideration, and one of which you ought not to lose sight. Remember the state of society in which we live. By what may be called an instinctive sense of propriety and delicacy of feeling, no single woman can ever live in the house or under the roof of a man she may eventually marry. The wife's sister may do so now, because the wife and the husband know there is no possibility of their future union. Repeal the law, however, and when the wife dies the wife's sister can no longer undertake the guardianship of her orphaned nieces, can no longer by any possibility live on the same terms of intimacy with the widowed husband, and cannot continue to render those services to the children which are attended with such great advantage to the motherless family. Now, I ask you this—will you for the sake of a few exceptional cases change the law, and say that on account of such exceptions you will deprive large numbers of persons of the advantage they now enjoy in obtaining for their family the guardianship of the aunt, which the deceased wife would probably herself desire, and which, after all, is the best substitute—I agree with my hon. Friend there—for a mother's love and a mother's care? My belief is, that you seriously diminish the chances of such guardianship, instead of securing them as you profess to desire. But this reasoning applies only to the death of the wife. I wish you now to consider whether a more serious evil will not arise to the state of society while the wife is living. Here is a question which more nearly affects the other sex than our own. We cannot appreciate so well as the other sex can the inestimable value of our present laws as regards the familiarity with which the wife, the wife's sister, and the husband can now live; but I hold in my hand a short letter on the subject, one of the most beautiful and touching letters which ever was penned—a letter published when this question was last before the House—purporting to be addressed by a lady to my most excellent and much valued Friend, Sir Robert Harry Inglis. I defy anybody to read this letter without feeling they are incurring a heavy responsibility if they make this change. The writer, describing herself as an Englishwoman, and a widow, has pointed out the fearful effect which any such alteration in the law will have upon society, and especially upon the female sex. She tells us distinctly that the reason why everything is pure now is because it is safe; that continued restraint is, in her own language, "removed temptation;" that removed temptation is woman's security; and that, by means of this security, the sister becomes, not in name only, but in fact, the sister to the husband as well as to the wife. She goes on to point out that thus, by means of marriage, the sphere of all our domestic relations and affections is extended and enlarged, but that, if you alter the law, this sphere will be narrowed and confined; that familiarity is uninterrupted because it is innocent; that there is no fear because there is no danger, and no jealousy because there is no suspicion. Now, I appeal to those who support this Bill to answer these arguments if they can, though, for my own part, it baffles my comprehension to understand by what reasoning they can be answered. But the lady writer of this letter does not end here. She goes on to say, in effect:—Remove these restrictions—change the law—and what a change you will introduce at once into the state of society! Restraint will become the rule between us, and the husband must put a check even upon the exhibition of his own brotherly feelings. The sister must stand aloof or keep at a comparative distance from the house in which she can now reside as a sister; the wife will lose to a great extent her sister's affection, and the holiest affections will thus be checked and driven back for fear they should be suspected of finding an outlet in the polluted streams of unsanctified desire, or (what is as bad for our social happiness) in the bitter waters of contention and strife. I almost wish I could read the whole of this beautiful letter; but this is a summary of the arguments contained in it. Well, Sir, I have already pointed out that, after the wife's death, you will lose the advantage of the sister's guardianship—that great advantage which you now enjoy owing to the state of the law, and to the restriction which puts a check upon criminal desire, because it declares that it can never be gratified. My hon. Friend (Mr. Spooner) will probably reply, "All this reasoning is very well as applicable to the higher classes of society, but you have to legislate in this matter for the lower orders; it is their requirements you have to attend to; and they live together in such crowded towns and with such miserable accommodation that you cannot prevent these marriages without driving them into a state of concubinage." Now, there would be great force in this argument if it were founded on fact; but what appears from the statistics got up by the supporters of this measure? The 1,560 cases of marriage of this description have been carefully analysed, and it has been found that 100 came from the higher ranks, upwards of 1,400 from the middle classes; and how many does the House suppose from among the lower orders? Only about fifty. And then I am told that this is a poor man's Bill? Why, it is just the reverse. It is a Bill encouraged and promoted by those who ought to be studying to raise the standard of morality, instead of lowering it. It is a Bill promoted and encouraged by those who ought to set an example of obedience to the laws, instead of instigating others to violate them. That argument, therefore, I think, will not hold, and if not, what are the grounds upon which we are to be called on to pass this measure? I wish some Members of the Government were present to whom I could appeal. [The Attorney General was the only occupant of the Ministerial bench.] I am aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman is in favour of this measure; but, though I should like better to address his chief, I will ask even the hon. and learned Gentleman if he thinks it wise to continue an agitation on this question unless there is a chance of carrying it? Are you not, by adopting this course, leaving society in a miserable state and encouraging people to violate the law by the hope that the law will be altered in their favour? And if you do alter it and allow these marriages, remember that they may have a dangerous effect not only upon domestic society and upon private virtue, but, I fear in the end, upon public morality also—

"Primum inquinavere, et genus, et domos."

But it does not rest there.

"Hoc fonte derivata clades

"In patriam populumque fluxit."

Pause, I entreat you, before it is too late. Remove no landmark and take away no fence unless you can see distinctly beyond them a landmark and a fence as strong as those you have now got, and which will prevent all future inroads in a similar direction. This Bill takes away the present landmarks, but what prospect does it give you for the future? If you pass the present measure, what, by logical consequence, will follow? Supposing this privilege is given to the man, I utterly deny that you can withhold it from the woman also. Then, if you adopt the rule followed in foreign countries, as some wish to do—as though the morality of foreign countries was better than our own!—see what it will lead you to. You will go to Germany, to Prussia, to some other of the Protestant States, and you will then have to admit that a man may marry his wife's daughter, or even his own niece. I do not stop here. If you take the line of argument which I see constantly adopted, and draw a distinction between consanguinity and affinity, what will be the consequence? In the table of prohibited degrees you have thirty degrees enumerated, twenty of which are cases of affinity and ten of consanguinity. Are you going to remove them all? I say, if you adopt this line of argument you must remove them all; nor will you be able to stop there; for, if you adopt the rule of taking the Levitical prohibitions, and of abiding by what marriages are laid down and what are not laid down there, the consequence will be that a man may marry his own daughter. [Mr. SPOONER: No, no!] My hon. Friend says, "No, no!" but will he turn to his Bible? and, if he does that, he will see that such a marriage is nowhere distinctly prohibited. The fact is, you have only one safe rule to abide by, and that is to take the original command, ratified and purified by our Saviour's injunction, and to say at once, as you have always said, that the marriage of a man with a woman carries with it such a complete union that the kindred of the one from that time forward becomes the kindred of the other. I have thought much upon this question, and I am free to declare that, after the utmost deliberation and consideration I can give it, I can find out no plain, no clear, no definite rule for our guidance but that. Strongly impressed as I am, therefore, with the necessity of adhering to some safe and intelligible course, I adopt that rule because I believe it to be consonant with the law of God, because I am sure that Christendom for 1,500 years has so considered it, and because this country has never recognised any other. I beg the House, therefore, to reject a measure which will sacrifice the interests of the many to gratify the pleasure of a few, which can only be done at the expense of scandalising the consciences and offending the principles of a large majority of the inhabitants of this realm, which is detrimental alike to private virtue and to public morals, and which will lead the promoters of the measure, if they are consistent with themselves, by the recourse to further and other restraints, to ulterior consequences, so strange and so alarming that they would tremble at the prospect of realising them.

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had listened with great attention and interest to the arguments of his right hon. Friend, but he was bound to say that the reasoning he had heard had not in any way shaken his deep conviction that the law which the House was now asked to repeal was an unnecessary, a tyrannical, a mischievous law, and one which it was discreditable to them to allow to remain any longer upon the Statute Book. It was fully admitted that it imposed a restraint on the natural feelings of mankind, and therefore ought to be repealed. The arguments used in support of the existing law were of a twofold character. It was said that social and domestic evils of very great magnitude would result from promoting marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Before discussing the defects of the existing law, he would briefly refer to an argument derived from a different source. It was said the question was already settled, the law of God having forbidden these marriages and declared them incestuous. Of course, if such a law were really in existence, they were bound at once to submit to it, and there would be an end to the question; but when he turned to the text in which the prohibitory law was said to be contained, he found that, so far from containing a prohibition against the marriage of a deceased wife's sister, it conveyed the very opposite meaning. The prohibition contained in the text was for the avowed purpose of preventing pain and vexation to the wife; and the conclusion to be drawn from the words used was, that they applied to a time when the wife was living and subject to annoyance and pain, and not to a time when death had relieved her from all pain and annoyance. When he found that the law was addressed to a people amongst whom polygamy, though not expressly sanctioned, was undoubtedly occasionally practised, and that the ground of the prohibition was, that the man should not marry the wife's sister, in order that he might not be tempted to put away his wife and take her instead, he was confirmed in supposing that the prohibition must refer to a period when the wife was living. With the exception of a small ascetic sect, the Hebrew people, to whom the law was addressed, always considered that the marriage with a deceased wife's sister was permitted and not prohibited, and in all ages such marriages had been sanctioned. It might be said, possibly, that the people of this country were not living under a Hebrew dispensation, but under a Christian dispensation, and that they were, therefore, to look to the laws enjoined by the Christian Church. If they looked to the practice of the first ages of the Christian Church, he granted that they must consider these marriages unlawful. But let it be recollected that Christianity took root under the shadow of the Roman law—by a fiction of which a person marrying became as closely related to the kin of the person married, as that very person was. Consequently, by that law a person could not marry his wife's sister, and this prohibition was congenial to the ascetic habits commonly prevailing in the early ages of the Christian Church, and subsequently practised. Second marriages were looked upon as heterodox, and third marriages were totally prohibited as abominations; the marriages of bishops and priests with widows, and their second marriages were also prohibited. It was not to be said that ages in which such principles were established should furnish our rule of conduct. In the Roman Catholic Church these marriages were considered as marriages which could not be entered into without the express sanction of the Church, but they were never rendered void; they were simply matters of dispensation, and the Roman Catholic Church never took upon itself to grant dispensations in marriages which were considered incestuous and prohibited by the law of God. At the present time there was not a single country in Europe, with the exception of England, in which the marriage with a deceased wife's sister was not celebrated and held to be legal when a dispensation had been obtained. Throughout all Protestant countries it had been permitted as not contrary to the law of God, and how was it that in this country it was prohibited? The dispensation which Henry VIII. sought to obtain with regard to his first wife must not be overlooked. Failing to obtain that dispensation, Harry obtained from one of the most servile Parliaments that ever existed, an Act which had reference to this particular class of marriages. He (the Attorney General) urged these arguments, not for the purpose of asserting that the doctrine of the English Church was not entitled to the highest authority, but to show that this was a matter in which every man ought to be left to the free exercise of his own conscience and opinion. When Protestant Europe was divided in opinion as to the construction to be placed upon the Levitical law, what right had the Parliament of this country to impose upon those who conscientiously differed from them their particular views upon the subject? The large majority of Dissenters were of opinion that the marriage with a deceased wife's sister was not contrary to the law of God, and what right had Parliament to put their construction upon a doubtful text and dogmatically enforce that construction? It was said that very serious evils would result from a change in the law in a social respect; that, looking to the unreserved intercourse which took place between a husband and his wife's sister, if they removed the artificial barrier which at this moment prevented the possibility of an undue intimacy existing between them, they would expose the husband to a temptation to which at present he was a perfect stranger, and would create a state of domestic immorality fatal to the morals of the people generally. It was also said that a change in the law would be to the wife a source of perpetual unhappiness and misery, and that with regard to the wife's sister, the consciousness that she might become an object of desire to the husband of her sister—that at a future time she might be capable of forming a conjugal union with him—would prevent the existence of that unreserved intercourse which now existed and would drive the sister from the home of the wife. These were most serious considerations, and, if it could be shown that such consequences were likely to ensue, he admitted that it would be most unwise to alter the law. But the whole of the arguments adduced in favour of the law were purely speculative, and not one particle of fact had been brought forward in their support. He entirely denied that any evil consequences would result from the alteration of the law, and he held that the advocates of the existing law unjustly defamed the morality of the English husband. The anticipations of evil were purely theoretical and speculative, for what had been the result where the experiment had been tried? The right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House discussed the question as though it had never been tried upon a great scale, and not as though the Legislature of this country were the only persons in the Christian world who prohibited these marriages. In Roman Catholic countries the marriage with a deceased wife's sister was not prohibited, in the case of an ecclesiastical dispensation being obtained; and who ever heard of domestic immorality between the husband and the wife's sister being the result in those countries? In Denmark, Sweden, Holland, and the United States, countries where the state of domestic morals was certainly as high as in this country, these marriages were permitted; but would they have been tolerated if the monstrous evils urged against them had been realised? Turning to the reverse of the picture, were there no evils upon the opposite side of the question? In the first place, the law had been openly violated or covertly evaded. They were told that from 500 to 600 of those marriages took place every year, and that in the course of the last twenty years no less than 12,000 marriages of this description had taken place. This might be an exaggeration, but no doubt many marriages had taken place, and the time would come when the consequences would be most disastrous. It was not those, however, who had contracted the marriage who would suffer. They satisfied their inclinations, and in their consciences believed that they had not violated the law of God. If they made laws against which human instincts and affections revolted, it was not to be supposed that human nature would not seek to liberate itself from their tyranny. The ill consequences of maintaining the present law would fall on those who might hereafter find themselves deprived of their just rights and legitimate expectations, and who might curse the day that had reduced them to misery. Nor was it only amongst the affluent class that the wish to contract these marriages prevailed. It was in vain to say that these cases were limited to a small number of instances. He believed that it was in the experience of all who were acquainted with the rural population, that these cases were common; and it was a cruel thing to drive these poor people into a kind of connection which might be a moral one, if the law did not drive them into one which was worse. That man took a mistaken view of the business of legislation who thought it was not the duty of the Legislature to deal with human nature as it found it. The business of law was to direct human action into a right course, and not to drive it into wrong; but, by preventing the marriage with a deceased's wife's sister, a gross state of immorality was engendered. Even supposing that the evils on both sides were balanced, was there no positive good prevented by the operation of the existing law? It was said that it was a woman's question, but, to his mind, it was a question of motherless children. Take the case of young children deprived at an early period of that most estimable of all God's blessings on earth—the fostering care of a mother's hand. Was it desirable to commit their young and tender years to the charge of a stranger, or to place them in the hands of one whom they had already learnt to look up to and love as a mother? But it was said that the Bill would prevent the wife's sister living with the father of her sister's children. But if the husband were young enough to marry again he might marry a stranger, and then the children would lose the protection of their aunt. He believed that the fears which had been expressed with respect to the repeal of the present law were wholly imaginary, while the evils which that law created were real and substantial. The present law prevented the positive good inherent in these marriages, and therefore the time was come when it ought to be expunged from the Statute Book. To those who thought these marriages wrong, the present law was unnecessary, while to those who thought them right it was an intolerable tyranny. It was, indeed, said that, after all, the Act of 1835 effected no such very great change in the law, for that these marriages were previously voidable. But any attempt to void them was looked upon with so much disfavour that it was rarely made; and besides that, if they were not voided during the lifetime of the parties they were thenceforth not voidable. But, before expunging the law from the Statute Book, let them consider how it got there. Twenty years ago the law stood upon a very different footing, the marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister being not void, but voidable. Some years ago, however, a noble and learned Lord introduced a Bill, which, in deference to a distinguished person who had contracted one of these marriages, legalised all marriages which had been previously contracted, but rendered them illegal in future. Thus it was, that the mild dominion of the old law was exchanged for the tyranny of the present. The absence of the noble Lord at the head of the Government had been regretted, on the ground that he would have interposed to endeavour to stop the agitation on this subject. He (the Attorney General) believed, however, that until they could make all mankind admit the policy of the existing law, and until they could remove the impression that that law was tyrannical and capricious, they would never be able to prevent the agitation of this question. He considered that the existing law was mischievous, uncalled for, and tyrannical; he, for one, would be no party to its maintenance; and he would, therefore, give his cordial assent to the second reading of this Bill.

MR. WIGRAM said, that the hon. and learned Attorney General had contended that the eighteenth verse of the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus did not prohibit these marriages. But those who opposed these marriages never had said that it did; they contended that that verse did not expressly admit them or remove the prohibition placed on them by the earlier verses of that chapter. For the first thirteen or fourteen centuries after the Christian era the universal Church had acted upon the principle of the present law, and he thought they should not disturb it on light grounds. The law was now settled and well understood; but if this Bill were passed it would be left in an undefined and unsettled state, and constant efforts would be made to disturb and to trench still further upon it. The maintenance of the present law was a matter of the greatest importance to the morality of society in this country, and if the law were invaded in the manner proposed by this Bill a licence and liberty would be indulged in with respect to marriage which would be attended with unhappy results. Whatever opinions might be entertained on this subject by different members of that House, there were very few of them who could approve of the present Bill. If there was any law which ought to stand upon a sound, consistent, and intelligible basis, it was the law of marriage; but he could not understand the proposition that a man should be allowed to marry two sisters in succession, but that a woman should not be allowed to marry two brothers. He thought that if Parliament interposed to vary the law of marriage, the change should be by a measure framed upon a comprehensive view of the subject, and adapted to place the law upon a consistent basis, regulated by some reasonable and intelligible rule. The last clause of the Bill proposed that the measure should not extend to Scotland, and why? Because it was perfectly well known that the feeling of the people of Scotland was so strongly opposed to marriages of this kind that the measure, if it should become law, would be scouted in that country. However, such an exemption in such a law was most objectionable, because it was a matter of the utmost importance that the law of marriage should be uniform throughout the United Kingdom. He considered that there were solid objections to the proposed alteration of the law founded upon the divine prohibition, and upon the social considerations suggested by the right hon. Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole); and he conceived that, if any change were made, it ought to be at least one which could place the law upon some sound footing. He should vote against the second reading of the Bill.

MR. COLLIER said, he thought that the nature of the objections urged against this Bill had very materially changed within the last few years. When a measure of this kind was first submitted to that House, the objections to it were founded upon the high ground, that marriage with the sister of a deceased wife was prohibited by the law of God, and was contrary to the law of nature. That high ground had latterly been evacuated by the opponents of the Bill, and the right hon. Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) now wished to throw the burden of proof upon those who supported the legality of these marriages. He (Mr. Collier) considered, however, that when the question was whether a man and woman could lawfully marry, those who objected to such marriage were bound to prove, if they could, that it was prohibited by the law of God; and he denied that any but the most paramount social considerations could justify them in putting asunder those who were joined together without any contravention of the divine law. The foundation and basis of the Act of Henry VIII., and of subsequent legislation on this subject, were the law of God, but that

argument seemed to have been virtually abandoned, for the right hon. Member for Midhurst admitted that it was doubtful whether such marriages were prohibited by the divine law, and that the question was one upon which the bench of bishops could not agree. The main objections to this Bill rested entirely upon social grounds, or he would rather describe them as sentimental grounds. With respect to the supposed scriptural prohibition, there was not a text which bore directly upon the subject, and the verse which had been quoted from the 18th chapter of Leviticus, though prohibiting marriage with the sister of a wife during her lifetime, inferred a permission to contract such a marriage after the wife's death. One of the arguments against this Bill had been founded on the fact, that the Scriptures prohibited the marriage of a man with the widow of his brother. It was, however, utterly impossible to maintain that a man was prohibited from marrying the widow of his brother on the ground of incest, because, in Deuteronomy, a man was commanded and enjoined to marry his brother's widow if she had no children. The hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) had the other night taunted the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Heywood) with wishing to remove all prohibitions with respect to marriage, and had called upon him to carry out his principle by marrying his grandmother like a man. He (Mr. Collier) hoped the hon. Member for West Surrey would act consistently, and that if his brother should die, leaving a widow childless, he would, in conformity with the scriptural injunction, marry his brother's widow, and raise up seed to his brother like a man. If these marriages were prohibited by the Scriptures, it might naturally be supposed that the Jews, having contracted such marriages, would have been rebuked for their transgression of the law; but all the enumerations by the prophets of the backslidings of the Jewish people contained no mention of this sin; nor was there in the New Testament one word disapproving of these marriages, or of the interpretation which the Jews in this respect had put upon the law. A great deal had been said about marriages of this description being prohibited by the law of nature; but he would venture to express his utter disbelief in a universal law of nature, which, so far as he could ascertain, had been revealed only to the Scotch. Such a law of nature was certainly not written on the hearts of continental nations, whether Protestant or Catholic; nor was it written on the heart of the Pope—nor was it written on the heart of the Parliament of Great Britain, which had passed measures sanctioning marriages of this description. It had been said that these marriages were prohibited by the canons of the Church, but he contended that it was doubtful whether what were called the Apostolic canons, upon which this argument rested, had emanated from the Apostles, and that, at all events, they ought not to influence the legislation of the British Parliament in the nineteenth century. Their origin, probably, did not date earlier than the end of the fourth century; and amongst these canons were also to be found provisions forbidding men to marry widows, actresses, and servant-maids; and yet five of the present bishops had married widows. Then the canons of another obscure council held in Spain had been relied upon. But those canons also forbade candles to be lighted in cemeteries during the day, for fear of disturbing the rest of the saints. He thought it was clear, therefore, that the canon law could not be relied upon as a safe basis for modern legislation. He now came to the statute law. The Act of Henry VIII. was in fact really passed to gratify the lusts and caprice of that Prince; while the Legislature, in fact, agreed to the Act of 1835, with the view of legalising certain unions of persons in a high position in society which were then voidable. Then, with regard to the social question. The real fact was, that the existing law sought to accomplish what could not be attained by legislation. It was impossible to make a man regard his wife's sister in the same light as he did his own! Equally fruitless, he believed, was the attempt to make the deceased wife's sister an affectionate aunt, by preventing her becoming the step-mother of her nephews and nieces. The House, likewise, must not forget that marriages of this nature were legal in foreign countries, and that those who were disposed to contract such marriages had only to cross the Channel, where they might form matrimonial connections which were perfectly legal abroad, and the validity of which was not likely to be questioned in this country. The existing law had been violated—it would be violated, it must be violated, because it interfered with the proper and natural course of one of the strongest passions of humanity. Upon these grounds, he would vote for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. NAPIER said, it appeared to him that the onus was cast upon those who sought to change the law, and not upon the other party, to give satisfactory reasons for making this tremendous experiment. The present law, he contended, was sacred in its foundation and salutary in its results. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had last addressed them was under a misapprehension when he said that the religious ground had been abandoned by the opponents of the proposed Bill. He certainly did not understand his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) to do so. On the contrary, his right hon. Friend had put that point forward prominently and primarily. He, however, apprehended that it did not weaken the Scriptural foundation of the law if they found by experience that it was attended with salutary and beneficial results. On the contrary, if he found that the law which they supposed to be in conformity with Scripture had produced satisfactory results, that fact would rather tend to corroborate the truth of its Divine origin than otherwise. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had complained of the tyranny of the present law. But what was the fact as regarded Ireland? He would venture to say that all classes in that country, high and low, rich and poor, viewed the proposed change in the law with abhorrence and disgust. When he (Mr. Napier) heard the accommodation of the poor alluded to, he looked to the lowly cabins of Ireland, and among them—the poorest and the humblest—he was bound to say of all persuasions—where, with all the miserable accommodation possessed by the poor, they would nevertheless find in general as large an amount of domestic propriety as the world could exhibit. Among the poorest and humblest in Ireland there was a deep religious sentiment of domestic propriety, and he could truly say he never heard of a case of incest in that country. The people of Ireland were utterly opposed to this measure, so were the people of Scotland; and the hon. Gentleman opposite, knowing that they were so, had not attempted to extend it to that country. Why, then, did he seek to force it on Ireland? There was in the history of the Church and of Christianity one continuous stream of testimony against such marriages. It was his deliberate and solemn conviction that the present law was based upon the law of God, as well as included in the social expansion of Christianity. In this view he was borne out by the testimony of all the reformed Churches, who were unanimous upon the subject; so, likewise, was the conclusion of some of the great lights of the Reformation, and of the ablest and best commentators upon the Holy Scriptures. The presumption, therefore, was all on the side of him who took his stand upon this testimony against the doctrine propounded by the other side. The present law harmonised with the opinions of the people of Scotland, the people of Ireland, and a large proportion of the people of England. Who, then, was the presumptuous man referred to by the Attorney General, as forcing his own opinion on others in this matter? In all the changes which had been made, and all the experiments that had been tried, there was not enough to cause him (Mr. Napier) to give up the comforts of English family life for the customs of America, of Germany, or of Denmark, or of other nations on the Continent. Believing that the present law was founded on the basis of religious and social principles of the best nature, he was not prepared to poril the blessings of an English home, or to incur the awful responsibility of enacting with a law of man which he believed would run counter to the law of God. A great deal had been said of the law of nature. What was the law of nature in this case? Who could venture to define it? Lord Stowell said that marriage was the parent of civil society; it should be held as of Divine origin. If the Word of God was looked to, it would be found that the chapter in question was founded on a general principle, and that it laid down certain restrictions. The Jewish law, however, was to be read with the full light of Christianity. Christianity brought back the marriage system of the Jew to one of purity and principle. The Jews themselves, according to the testimony of the Rev. Mr. Jacobs, held that their traditional law excluded the marriage of two sisters in succession; and in the light of Christianity we could say no less. Marriage symbolized that mysterious unity which was set forth in Christianity, and it was just by adhering to this unity that the marriage law could be kept in accordance with the will of God. Therefore it was that the wife's relations became the husband's relations. In marriage the parties were described as "one flesh," and our Lord said, "Whom God hath joined let no man put asunder." It was the duty of Christians to bring this unity closer and closer, where-

as the effect of the present Bill was to relax the marriage unity. We were called on to recede from the point to which society had advanced under the light of Christianity—to go back behind the position to which the Jews had attained. We were called on to bring down our marriage arrangements to meet the requirements of the passions or the lusts of a few persons who were unable to bear the restraints of law. Looking for a moment at the authorities on this question, he found from an able work published by Mr. Gibson, of Glasgow, which contained much valuable information, that we had in opposition to these marriages the Jewish Church, the early Christian Church, the Church of the Waldenses, the Reformed Church of France, and such men as Calvin, Beza, Poole, the celebrated annotator; the learned Hammond, Scott, Henry, and other commentators; that great light of the Reformation, Bishop Jewell, and a host of others whose opinions no man need be ashamed to follow. That was his (Mr. Napier's) answer to the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier.) Was the House prepared to repeal that part of the table of degrees which was based upon affinity? The supporters of the Bill relied on the passage in Deuteronomy, in which, by the way, the word was always "wife," not "widow." Why, however, should the prohibition to marry a husband's brother be maintained, if that for marrying a wife's sister was to be removed? This chapter included the cases of affinity as well as of consanguinity. If parallel cases were to be supplied, on what ground was the present case excluded? The Reformation founded its prohibitions in the cases derived from the word of God; and, accordingly, the marriage law in this country had come down to us associated with the great and inestimable blessings of the Reformation. If the tendency of the marriage of a woman with her husband's brother was to lead to impurity of life, so much more would be that of a man's marriage with his wife's sister. The hon. and learned Attorney General spoke of the hardship that would be inflicted on the children of a woman on her death; but the Bill went to deprive a wife during her lifetime of the affection and protection of her husband by sowing jealousy in her mind. Was, however, that House at liberty to set aside the great and mysterious law of marriage unity for these superficial reasons?—to discard the authority of the Established Church, which had this great advantage over continental reformed churches, that it did not coerce, but did not permit private opinion to run loose in every way it liked, without restraint or guidance. Christianity elevated the position of the female sex, it removed all ideas of impurity, and it set up a moral standard for our fallen nature. The institution of marriage as it now existed was Christianity applied to the forms of social life, consequently it was based on the Word of God. The early canons of the old Irish Church, in the time of St. Patrick, perhaps the purest of all the Christian Churches at that period, were opposed to marriages of the nature contemplated by the Bill. St. Patrick himself subjoined his reasons to those canons, which were that a brother should not marry his brother's wife because she was his sister. He said, chap. 25—"De thoro fratris defuncti." "Audi decreta synodi, superstes frater thorum defuncti non ascendat, Domino dicente. 'Erunt duo in carne und'—Ergo uxor fratris tui soror tua est." Was a wife's sister less so than a brother's wife? If the affinity was removed as a bar, it would be putting asunder those whom God had joined together, and permitting all the passions of the ignorant poor, or the carnal and sensual rich, to have full range. The agitation that had been excited on this subject was one of passion, not of principle. No expense had been spared to rake up cases, under the pretence that it was for the interests of the poor. He denied that it was for the interest of the poor that society should recede from the point to which it had been advanced by the Reformed Churches; and he asserted that there was nothing to which the Church stood more distinctly pledged than prohibition in such cases. There was another canon of the Church of Ireland, said to be of the eighth century, but probably a century later, which was equally explicit on the point. It said, if any man married two sisters, or any woman married two brothers, he or she should be excommunicated usque ad mortem. The 47th canon of the Irish Reformed Church, constructed in 1634 by that great and learned man, Archbishop Ussher, said that no persons could marry within the prohibited degrees set forth in the English table of affinities of 1563, and speaks of such marriages as incestuous and against God's law. In 1561 Bishop Jewell wrote as follows—

"Albeit I be not forbidden by plain words to marry my wife's sister, yet am I forbidden so to do by other words which by exposition are plain enough. For when God commands me I shall not marry my brother's wife, it follows directly by the same that he forbids me to marry my wife's sister. For between one man and two sisters, and one woman and two brothers, is like analogy or proportion, which is my judgment in this case."

But he (Mr. Napier) would also take the opinions of enlightened laymen on the subject. Chief Baron Gilbert, as reported, said—

"It is necessary, to perfect the union of marriage, that the husband should take the wife's relatives in the same degree to be the same as his own without distinction, and so vice versa; for if they are to be the same person, as was intended by the law of God, they can have no difference in relations, and by consequence the prohibition touching affinity must be carried as far as the prohibition touching consanguinity."

The 18th chapter of Leviticus, v. 6, he adds, is expounded by the examples which authorise the table of degrees, which is plainly the decision of this reformed Church. Blackstone says, the canonical disabilities are either grounded upon the express words of the divine law, or are consequences plainly deducible from them. The early Church and our own reformers took the same view of marriage as our Lord, when He corrected the error of the Jew by going back to the original marriage arrangement, "They twain shall be one flesh." By the present Bill they were relaxing this unity of marriage, putting asunder those whom "God had joined together." In discussing this question, it had been said that there was no distinct prohibition of these marriages on the face of God's word. In endeavouring to ascertain what the mind of God was on this subject, we were not so much to go by a selected text as by the general tenour of the Scriptures. We were to "search the Scriptures," in order to discover God's will and our own duty. We were first to look at the institution of the marriage where it was described as making the two "one flesh;" then, at the special provisions made for the Jews; and in the light of Christianity we were to form our judgment, drawing closer the unity of the marriage tie rather than unloosing it. Just let the House consider the position in which an affectionate woman would be placed if, with this proposed law in force, she appeared at the bedside of a dying married sister. The very affection she exhibited for her sister and her sister's children would subject her to suspicion and the tongue of scandal.

Once the step was taken, the happiness of English homes was at an end, and there was, moreover, no redress. In fact, if once the step was taken, who could say where it would stop? The Bill said those who should celebrate such marriages were not to be liable to censure or punishment. That, however, was a direct interference with the discipline of the Church. The Bill did not seek simply to repeal the Act of 1835, but in effect to abolish the bar of affinity altogether. But if affinity was abolished, what would be the result; only then see what inextricable confusion would be created. Chancellor Kent said on this point—and his doctrine is worthy of all attention—

"Under the influence of Christianity a purer taste and stricter doctrine have been inculcated, and an incestuous connection between an uncle and niece has been recently adjudged by a great master of public and municipal law to be a nuisance extremely offensive to the laws and manners of society, leading to endless confusion, and the pollution of the sanctity of private life."

Yet this is not expressly prohibited in Scripture, and when the Bill was first introduced the noble Lord at the head of the Government said he did not consider it contrary to the law of God. Sir Herbert Jenner, however, in reference to the Act 5 & 6 Will. IV., said, "The Legislature has expressed as strongly as it could do that these marriages are still illegal, and contrary to the law of God." The noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) said, alluding to the observation of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, "Hold by your Christianity, and the country is secure." So said he (Mr. Napier). In a recent case, upon an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, Baron Parke delivered the unanimous judgment, and declared the marriage to be null and void, as incestuous and "illegal by divine and human law." Thus, there was one continued testimony of the objection of the Church and of the State to these marriages as unhallowed and illegal down to the most recent period, and yet, now they were called upon in the nineteenth century to go back to the practice of remote ages, and to adapt our laws to meet the case of those who had defied and violated the law of God, and the law of the land, so repeatedly and explicitly enacted. Looking at the subject as a matter of social policy, it was competent for the Legislature to restrict marriages on that ground; and it could not pass such a law as that now proposed without taking on itself a tremendous responsibility. Supposing the question to be doubtful in a religious point of view, still the Legislature would be safe in allowing the law to remain as it stood at present, whereas Parliament, if it said that a particular kind of marriage should be valid, which a great amount of continuous testimony affirmed to be against the word of God, might incur a very great responsibility by introducing this new element into the social system. Admitting that in some parts of the country the people might be so impure as to desire such marriages, still Christianity did not stoop to gratify our passions, and the remedy was to educate the people up to the great principles of Christianity. Christianity undoubtedly made allowances for human infirmity, but it made no compromise with sin. Dr. Chalmers had been mentioned as having, in a passing observation, intimated an opinion in favour of these marriages; but Principal Lee, of Edinburgh, stated that he knew Dr. Chalmers' deliberately expressed judgment to be the very opposite, and that Dr. Chalmers considered that parties marrying within these forbidden degrees should not be allowed to be in communion with the Church. Were the proposers of the Bill prepared to take all the marriage laws of those foreign countries whose example they quoted? Were they prepared to take their multiplied facilities for divorce? The Bill menaced the whole social scheme in this country, which was based upon lawful marriage. It threatened to degrade Christianity, upon which our institutions were founded, by degrading the marriage law. The 18th verse of the chapter of Leviticus, so much relied on, interpreted by the light of Christianity, forbade, by inference, such marriages. Polygamy and slavery were not so expressly prohibited in words in Scripture; they were prohibited by inference; and yet, who doubted their criminality? More plainly prohibited is marriage within certain degrees of affinity. He (Mr. Napier), fortified by the high authority of Scripture, and the identity of view on the part of the lights of the Reformation with those he so weakly expressed, prayed the House to pause before it agreed to the Bill. He would not worship authority, but he would not despise what he was bound to use in forming his own convictions and to bring all to the test and standard of the Divine Word. He would support the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. MONCKTON MILNES said, that if the arguments used by the right hon. and learned gentleman were addressed by one man to another for the purpose of dissuading him from contracting a marriage of this kind, they would certainly deserve the most serious consideration and carry with them very great weight; but he must protest against the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to force on other Members of the community obedience, not only to the clear precepts of the Word of God, but to his deductions from the Holy Scriptures. Such a principle was the origin of all hierarchical tyranny, and had been the foundation of much persecution on the part of the Church, and of much misery on the part of mankind. What business had the right hon. and learned Gentleman to stand forward and denounce a man who felt his Christian obligations and responsibilities as strongly as the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself, of being actuated by an ill-regulated sensuality if he arrived at the conclusion that he could contract such a marriage as was now under discussion without infringing the law of God? If the right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement were true, that these marriages were only contracted from the motives he had imputed, he (Mr. M. Milnes) firmly believed they would never in that case have become the subject of discussion in that House. It was only because these marriages had been contracted by men otherwise irreproachable in their conduct and respected by their fellow-citizens that that House was called upon to discuss the question. He asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether, if these marriages were to be regarded as properly incestuous, the people of this country would have allowed the law on the subject to have remained for so many years in the uncertain and unsatisfactory state described by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General? It was because he (Mr. M. Milnes) believed that the moral sense of the people demanded the alteration of the present law that he felt bound to support the Bill, and not on theoretical grounds; for his life had been passed among a large community of people deeply interested in the question. He denied that there was any foundation for the right hon. and learned gentleman's insinuation, that the population among which these marriages took place were either ill-educated or corrupted in their social and religious condition. On the contrary, the practice existed among the most intelligent and best educated classes in this country. Surely, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would hardly call the people of Leeds, among whom a feeling in favour of these marriages prevailed, sanctioned by the opinion of Dr. Hook, an ignorant population living without spiritual guidance? When, then, he found clergymen, as well as a large majority of the people among whom he lived, in favour of the present Bill, and when he knew that the idea of such marriages being legal before a certain day, and not legal afterwards, was repulsive to their sense of justice, he felt that he could not with propriety do otherwise than support the proposition before the House. What the advocates of the present measure maintained was that marriages of consanguinity were contrary to the law of God; but that marriages of affinity were modified in different countries to a certain extent, according to circumstances of a social and political nature; and at all times the Roman Catholic Church had assumed the right of dispensing with any regulations with regard to marriages of the latter description. In Portugal the permission to marry with a wife's sister could hardly be procured by any influence whatever, whereas a dispensation for a marriage between an uncle and a niece was easy to be obtained, thus showing that dispensations with respect to affinity marriages were not regulated by any absolute law, but by the judgment of the Church as to what was best suited to the habits and temper of a people. He did not say that these marriages were in any degree to be encouraged, but he drew a distinction between the advisability of them and the right of the House to prevent them. He was aware of the terrible consequences which the present law entailed on the children of those persons who contracted these marriages, and he felt that that number was growing larger every day. From his own experience in the neighbourhood where he lived he knew that the frequency of these marriages daily increased, and, before long, the right to an immense mass of property among the middle classes would be hanging on the decision of that House with respect to the present question. There was a large number of persons in a state which the law declared to be illegitimate, but which public opinion, and especially the opinion of the society among whom they lived, declared to be legitimate. The present condition of the law must necessarily create great discontent, and he entreated the House not to inflict on an innocent progeny the injurious consequences of an enactment which many persons as wise as any to be found in that assembly believed to be unjust.

Mr. KER SEYMER said, that the hon. and learned Attorney General had presented himself to the House that day in a new capacity. The chief law officer of the Crown had appeared as the advocate of those who had deliberately broken the law, by means, in some instances, no doubt, of perjury; for many of these marriages could not have taken place except through the aid of a false oath. He had hoped that the House would not again have been called on to discuss this question, and that the existing law would have been acquiesced in; but that seemed now to have been only a pleasing delusion, and when he saw advertisements of a society for procuring an amendment of the law of marriage, with a treasurer, secretary, and clerks, he began to be aware of what must follow. A greater sham was never attempted to be imposed on Parliament than that it was the poor who were agitating for the present Bill. If the poor were the only parties concerned they might depend upon it the House would never have heard of the measure. It was not the poor who sent lawyers' clerks through the country at great expense to obtain signatures to petitions. He did not wish to argue this question on scriptural grounds, though he thought the argument against the Bill, founded on them, to be perfectly maintainable, but he conceived that the House of Commons was the least adapted place for the discussion of strictly religious questions. He could not, however, entirely pass over what might be called the ecclesiastical view of the case. The House was now for the first time called on to place the law of the land in direct opposition to the law of the Church. He could conceive a case when it might be necessary to do that; but it must be, he maintained, a case of great necessity, and, he asked, did that great necessity exist in the present instance? There was no doubt that the 99th Canon was binding on the clergy, and in connection with the law had hitherto been a guide to the conduct of the laity. Look, then, at the position in which the present Bill, if passed, would place the clergy, declaring, as it would, that they might break the law of the Church with impunity, if they pleased, or they might refuse to do so. This was a most unfair position in which to place the clergy. The great objection, however, which he entertained against abandoning the law of the Church was, that it would be impossible, then, to tell where to draw the line. The modern Nonconformists were not safe guides on this subject, for Dr. Cox, a Baptist minister, who was examined before the Commission, stated that he had no objection to any marriages where there was no consanguinity, for he considered that marriages within the degrees of affinity ought to be tolerated. The clergy, too, of the Established Church, who had abandoned the rule of their Church on this question, had got into the greatest confusion with reference to this particular point, and one of them, who was examined before the Commission, actually did not know the difference between degrees of consanguinity and of affinity. The old Nonconformists were not so lax as their descendants, for Matthew Henry, in commenting on the chapter which had been so often referred to, thus expressed himself—

"It has been generally laid down as a rule, that what relations of a man's own he is bound not to marry with, the same relations of his wife's he is likewise forbidden to marry, for they two are one."

The practice of Protestant Germany with regard to the law of divorce must completely prevent us from taking her as a guide in these matters, as was suggested. The law of divorce there was plainly opposed to the law of Christianity; for, while that law only admitted of divorce a vinculo matrimonii for one cause only, the law of Germany granted it for various reasons. Many thoughtful and religious men in Germany deeply lamented this state of things, but the perversity of human nature was such, and the license probably so agreeable, that all efforts for a change in the law had been unavailing. They had been also told to look to America, and to the opinion of Mr. Justice Story; but Mr. Justice Story stated that though marriages between brother and sister were incestuous, it was impossible to extend the principle beyond that limitation. Such opinions were very dangerous, and it was the prevalence of such laxity of opinion regarding the marriage state that had given rise to Mormonism and the Mormon republic. With reference to Roman Catholics, Dr. Pusey and Dr. Wiseman had given evidence—the first, straightforward and clear, the other, as it appeared to him, with a view to mystify the question. With regard to the practice of the Roman Catholic Church on this point, hon. Members were probably not aware that the very first dispensation which was granted for a marriage with a wife's sister was granted by the infamous Borgia, who also granted a dispensation for the marriage of an uncle with a niece. The dispensations of the Roman Catholic Church, therefore, could not add any great force to the arguments in favour of these marriages. It was rather a singular thing, considering that the Roman Catholic priests were in favour of the alteration of the law, that the whole of the Irish people, instead of going along with their priests, as usual, were universally opposed to these marriages. Female purity was one of the most distinguished virtues of the Irish character, and the relations between the sexes there were on a high footing; and very naturally, therefore, marriages of this description were disliked and condemned by the Irish people. It was said that we ought to trust to nature to draw the line; but it was not said what sort of a nature it was that was to be trusted to. What we read with regard to the habits and customs of nations in a state of uncultivated nature would scarcely lead us to suppose that there was any great restraint practised among them in those matters, while, as for civilised nature, at ancient Athens—the most civilised community, perhaps, the world ever saw—marriages with the half-blood were legal, and the law of Rome, after the time of Claudius, allowed the marriage of an uncle with his niece. It had been stated by an hon. Member that this was an interference with domestic and natural rights. He did not understand this kind of argument. We did not interfere with natural rights in several instances, when such a power of interfering was proper and for the good of society. He contended that it was for the good of society that natural rights on the question of marriages should give way to the advantage of the community. Much had been said of the wealth and respectability of the persons who were affected by this prohibition, and who had broken through it. Wealthy no doubt they might be, but with respect to their respectability he demurred. It was not a very respectable thing to marry in opposition to the law—sometimes, if not always, by means of perjury—and to become the father of a family of illegitimate children. Neither was there any force in the argument, that such persons had been well received in society after contracting such marriages. He was afraid that many men were better received in society than they ought to be who had broken the Seventh Commandment, and he had never heard of any gentleman who, having obtained a seat in that House by corrupt means, and having been afterwards unseated on petition for bribery, found that his friends and acquaintances turned their backs on him in consequence. But though that was the case, it was not thought any less necessary to increase the stringency of the law with regard to bribery. The evidence before the Commission was, in his opinion, very one-sided, for the promoters of this change were of course well organised, and took every possible pains to bring forward witnesses to support their own view of the question, while, on the contrary, the opposition, being unorganised, was left very much to take its own chance. The evidence produced, however, by the supporters of the alteration was so redundant that it actually proved too much, and the Commissioners, being conscious of that, were obliged, in some instances, to fall back on their own knowledge, and reported in the teeth of the evidence laid before them. It was urged that the House ought to legislate for the working classes who had contracted marriages of this description; but, with all respect for the labouring classes, he was not inclined to take their conduct and their habits as a guide for the legislation of that House. He very much doubted, however, the frequency of these marriages among those classes, and, even if it were as was represented, the proper policy to adopt was to educate them up to the law, and not to lower the law to the state of degradation in which they might unfortunately be. To the argument that the widower, if he married again, would marry a stranger, he would say that might be so, but there could be no hardship in that, as the sister might still exercise those duties towards the children quite as freely as if she married her brother-in-law. All moral arguments were against this alteration of the law, and it was to the credit of the women of England that they were generally against the change. He could not understand why hon. Members who took up this question did not go to the whole length, and sanction, according to Scripture, the marriage of one woman with two men. The supporters of the measure had asserted that the opinion of almost every country in the world was favourable to the measure, but that it was not their intention to extend the Bill to Scotland, because the Scotch Members, in that case, would vote against it. No people cared so little for the canon law as the Scotch did; but bringing to the study of the Bible that intelligence and education for which they were distinguished, they had arrived at the conclusion that these marriages were against the law of God. He warned the Scotch Members that, if this Bill passed, their turn would come next. The late Lord Rutherford, when Lord Advocate, in the evidence which he gave before the Commission, stated that he thought any alteration of the law of marriage in England ought to apply also to Scotland, for that the worst consequences would result from having a different marriage law in each country, and from declaring a marriage within certain degrees to be incestuous on one side of the Tweed and legal on the other. Some disappointment might be felt at the rejection of this measure by persons who had built their hopes on its becoming law; but he was convinced that the great body of the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland would support the House in showing a bold front against any change of the law. He believed that the throwing out of this Bill might prevent other Bills of a similar kind being brought forward, and that on this important subject the law of the land, the law of the Church, and the law of public opinion would be, that "a man may not marry his wife's sister."

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he was somewhat indifferent to the supposed evils on either side, but he was anxious to see the question argued as a religious one. The law could have no justification, except upon a religious ground, and the alteration would have had no justification except upon the same ground. He did not think that the law of marriage ought to be tampered with, but would it be said that the Act of 1835 did not tamper with the law of marriage? He heartily re-echoed the assertion that the law of marriage ought not to be tampered with except the law of God sanctioned the alteration. Ought not the House, however, to remove the disgrace to the statute-book made by the law of 1835? The right hon. and learned gentleman the member for Dublin University

(Mr. Napier), though he had commenced marriage with a deceased wife's sister ; by disclaiming any wish to attribute a conclusive effect to the authorities which he quoted, had yet based the whole force of his argument upon them ; but, for his part, there was no point on which he should be less disposed to defer to the authority of the Church than on this of marriage, for on none other had she been so long and so completely and so obstinately wrong. Every prohibited degree must stand or fall by the Divine law, as set forth in Scripture ; and a careful examination of the 18th chapter of Leviticus, to which so much reference had been made, convinced him that there was scarcely the semblance of an argument for this prohibition to be extracted from that source. Indeed, it was obvious that that chapter was not a complete code of marriage law, and it inferentially implied the previous existence of a natural law which was binding on the heathen nations as well as on the Jews, because the abominations of the Canaanites in relation to marriage were there denounced as sin, and where there was no law there plainly could be no sin. Again, one of the first conditions essential to a law was, that it should be so given as to be understood by those to whom it was addressed. Now, the interpretation that had been put upon their law by the highest authorities among the Jews in all ages was, that these marriages were not forbidden, but, on the contrary, were rather encouraged ; and the Chief Rabbi of that persuasion stated in his evidence that in all their books of rabbinical learning there was not a single opinion to be found in support of their prohibition. Would it, however, be contended that there was such a prohibition in the Divine law, which, although not binding on the Jews in past times, on account of their ignorance and darkened understandings, was nevertheless of imperative obligation on the Christian ? Let those who might seriously think of urging such an argument weigh for a moment all the dangerous consequences which it involved. The whole history of the Christian church for many successive centuries proved that the promulgation of no doctrine had been more fruitful in mischief than that which aimed at creating a fictitious and over-strained purity in regard to marriage. The present law of England on this subject did not secure greater morality than would result from the sanction and allowance of and experience showed it was impossible to educate the people up to the sentiment which kept alive this prohibition. There being, then, no disallowance of these marriages in the law of God, the next question was as to their desirability in a social point of view, and that was a matter which men should be left to decide for themselves, according to the varying circumstances of each case. The feeling of the people in other parts of the United Kingdom might, as was alleged by the opponents of the Bill, be inimical to the legalization of these marriages ; but why was a man in England, who wished to contract one, and saw nothing inconsistent with the Word of God in doing so, to be fettered by the scruples of a Scotch or an Irish conscience ? For these reasons, then, and looking at the grievous evils which had befallen civilized society in all times from unwise tamperings with the right of marriage, he would give his vote in favour of the removal of the restrictions dealt with by this Bill.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had argued that there was no traditional proof that the Jews from the earliest times objected to a man marrying two sisters. Now, if he had referred to a paper which was handed in by the Rev. R. C. Jenkins to the Commissioners, he would have found this passage—

“ It appears, however, that the traditional law of the Jews did exclude the marriage of two sisters in succession, but whether upon the ground of this passage (in Leviticus), or upon some more general law, does not clearly appear.”

An eminent authority on the same point was the work of one of the most learned, profound, and respected authors of antiquity—namely, Philo-Judæus, who lived before the commencement of the Christian era. Philo-Judæus having described this command not to espouse two sisters as an injunction of great excellence, and one which contributed greatly to temperance and good order, and having also commented on the bad laws of other States, permitting incestuous marriages, proceeded as follows—

“ On which account our lawgiver (Moses) has also forbidden other matrimonial connections, commanding that no man shall marry his granddaughter, whether she be his son's or his daughter's child ; nor his niece ; nor his aunt ; nor his grandmother, by either father or mother ; nor any woman who has been the wife of his uncle, or of his son, or of his brother ; nor, again, any stepdaughter, whether virgin or widow, whether his own wife be alive, or even after her death. For, in principle, a stepfather is the same as a father, and, therefore, he ought to look upon his wife's daughter in the same light as his own. Again, he does not permit the same man to marry two sisters, neither at the same time, nor at different periods."

Further on, the same writer said—

"And sisters are like limbs, which, although they are separated from one another, are nevertheless all adapted to one another by nature and natural relationship. And jealousy, which is the most grievous of all passions, is continually producing new, and terrible, and incurable mischiefs."

The hon. and learned Attorney General denounced the existing law on this subject as tyranny—a strange argument, assuredly, from one who ought to be the luminous expositor of the common law of the country! His allusion, no doubt, was to what was called Lord Lyndhurst's Act; but Lord Lyndhurst introduced no new law. Lord Chief Justice Campbell, in his profound and lucid speech on this subject, said—

"The agitators went about the country, asserting in the most positive terms that until Lord Lyndhurst's Bill passed, these marriages were sanctioned by the law of England. Now, the fact was, that Lord Lyndhurst's Act had made no alteration in the law; it had only altered the mode of procedure by which these unlawful marriages were to be set aside. There had been previously a great defect in the law of England on this point. Marriages, however censurable on the ground of incest, were not void. Even if a man married his own sister or his mother, he (Lord Campbell) was ashamed to say that that was not a void marriage; it stood good until it had been set aside by the decrees of a competent judge. Lord Lyndhurst's Act properly provided that those marriages which heretofore had only been voidable should be void, as they had been before the Reformation, and as they were in Scotland at this time. Lord Lyndhurst introduced no new law, but only improved the mode of procedure—the manner in which the law was to be in future enforced."

From the second century downwards these marriages were not allowed in this country, and although the Act of 1835, operating retrospectively, prevented them from being annulled, it still left the persons who had contracted them responsible for their incestuous conduct to the Ecclesiastical Courts. Lord Campbell said it was natural and reasonable enough, where ignorance and confusion as to the law existed in the country, to secure the marriages contracted in such a state of things from being annulled; but there was no instance on record of men who knew the law, and yet with their eyes open wilfully violating it, appealing successfully to Parliament to induce it to accommodate the law to their wishes, and thus making their deliberate infraction of it an argument for the change. Again, there was the authority of Lord Brougham, whose enlightened mind was not fettered by technicalities, but always took a comprehensive view of every question to which it applied itself. That noble and learned Lord said—

"The truth was, those marriages were void ab initio; but, as it required the sentence of a court of law to declare them void, the expression came to be used, that they were voidable. All that the sentence did was to declare the invalidity that already existed."

Lord Brougham's opinion, therefore, was in conformity with that of the head of the common law of this country. One of the concluding clauses of this Bill declared that the Act should not extend to Scotland, but it would be absolutely impossible to pronounce marriages incestuous in Scotland which would be perfectly legal in England. And on this point one of the petitions against the Bill, presented within the last few days from Scotland, very justly observed—

"Your petitioners believe that if such a Bill becomes law, it will be contrary to the Word of God, destructive of the peace and privy of families, and an outrage on the best feelings of the great majority of the inhabitants of this country. Your petitioners are aware that the present Bill is not intended to apply to Scotland; but this does not remove their objections to it. Besides, they deem it impossible that the law on such a subject can remain different in the several parts of the kingdom for any length of time."

They were constantly approximating towards an assimilation of the commercial law of different parts of the kingdom, and yet, on a much more important and even a sacred question, they were now asked to establish one law for England and another for Ireland and Scotland. It was earnestly to be hoped that the House would discourage all such attempts, and, following the advice of the Lord Chief Justice, and deferring to the most learned and pious authorities of all antiquity, put an end once for all by a decisive majority to the further discussion of this subject; and let them not for a moment be deterred from rejecting the Bill by the threat of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, which he must have borrowed from certain orators of the sister country—namely, that if the House threw out this measure, his cry would be, "Agitate, agitate, agitate!"

Debate adjourned till Wednesday, 9th May.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, April 26, 1855.

TWEEN BALAKLAVA AND LONDON.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE rose to put a question to the Government which had reference to a subject of great public importance. It had been reported that the telegraphic communication was so nearly completed between Balaklava and London that the Government had had some opportunity of knowing what had occurred even within the last twenty-four hours. He, therefore, ventured to ask if such were the fact; and, if so, whether the Government could communicate anything material to their Lordships from the seat of war?

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that the First Lord of the Admiralty had received a telegraph from Balaklava within a space of less than twenty-four hours. However, it merely announced the opening of the communication, and conveyed no intelligence with respect to the siege.

EXPORT OF HORSES.

THE EARL OF MAMESBURY asked the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government had any means of supplying a return of the number of horses exported from this country within a certain period to be specified? because, if so, he should move for a return on the subject. He was induced to ask this question as the subject had a not unimportant bearing on the war now going on in the East. It had come to his knowledge that within the last six months an immense number of horses had been exported from this country to France, and that during the last three weeks 1,000 horses had been exported from Folkestone alone to that country. It was well known that one of the most important elements in the service was the supply of horses, and so large an exportation must prove extremely detrimental to the supply of our cavalry, which was already more than deficient; and he wished to ask the Government whether, under the circumstances in which the country was now placed, they thought it wise that an unlimited export of horses from this country should be allowed to take place? He should not object to the export of stallions to France; but, under present circumstances, he thought we should, as much as possible, keep brood mares and young horses in this country. He believed that the price of horses had risen as much as 10 and 15 per cent, and surely nothing could be so absurd as that the French Government should be bidding against us for the horses which were wanted for the service in which the two countries were engaged. It was like a man and his commissioner going into an auction room, and bidding against each other. He should, therefore, like to know whether the information he required could be furnished, as in that case he would move for returns.

LORD STANLEY or ALDERLEY replied, that there would be no objection to the return desired by the noble Earl. The attention of the Government had been called to the fact, but he was not aware that a larger number of horses than usual had been exported except to France. He was not prepared to say that the Government had any intention of limiting the exportation of horses at present.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that some years ago, when he was Attorney General, there was a great exportation of horses, and the question then arose whether or not the Government could prevent the exportation; it was his duty to examine into the law on the subject, and he found that there had formerly such a power been given by ancient statutes; but that such statutes had been repealed, and the Government had now no power to prevent the exportation.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that when Secretary of State for War his attention had been drawn to this subject, and he had procured a return from the Custom House, showing the number of horses exported during the first nine months of last year. He did not find, however, that that number, though considerable, was much greater than during the corresponding portion of 1853. Of course he could not state what had been the case during the last three or four months.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY imagined, after what had been stated, that there could be no objection to his moving for a return of the number of horses exported from this country from the 1st of January, 1854, to the present time. The number exported in time of peace had no bearing upon the number exported now, when the price for cavalry horses had risen 20 per cent, and there was considerable danger of a scarcity. He reminded their Lordships, also, that the disasters which our army in the East had experienced last year might be traced mainly to the inefficiency of the land transport.

EARL GREY presumed that the Government would consent to the Motion; but, at the same time, he could not help expressing his great satisfaction at hearing from his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chief Justice, that the Government had no power to prohibit the exportation of horses without passing a law for that purpose, and he hoped that no law would be introduced which would throw any impediment in the way of the due profits of exportation. That was a course which he hoped Parliament would not be induced to adopt; for it was impossible to conceive a more short-sighted policy than that of attempting to throw difficulties in the way of owners of horses turning them to the best advantage. The supply which the noble Earl desired would best arise from that very rise of price of which he now complained. Indeed, he believed that such a course would tend to increase the scarcity, for their Lordships would remember that this was not the only country in want of horses, and, probably, if the Government restricted their exportation, other nations would follow their example, and we should have great difficulty in procuring such a supply of horses and mules as was absolutely necessary, for it must not be forgotten that we were purchasing horses and mules in other countries.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY did not wish in the least to interfere with the freedom of trade in the exportation of horses, but he did not conceive that keeping brood mares in the country would have any other effect than to encourage the breed of horses. He very much doubted whether horses in any number were imported into this country; but in order to ascertain the fact he would also move for a return of the number imported as well as exported within the period he had mentioned. He believed that while the number exported would be found to be very large, the return of the number imported would be nil. With respect to free trade, he had opposed it, but he had no wish to interfere with it again. The question was settled, and there was an end of it.

EARL GREY observed, in explanation, that he did not mean that horses were purchased in large numbers for this country, but for the use of the army in the East.

LORD VIVIAN reminded the House that the extra price given by the Government for horses was to be accounted for by the fact, that whereas before the war, they purchased animals of three and even two years, they now bought only those that were from five to eight years old.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he had as little wish as his noble Friend could have to interfere with free trade; but it was important to consider whether it would not be carrying free trade too far to permit the exportation of horses at a moment when this country was at war. What did France do? France would not permit horses to be exported from her shores. Throughout Europe and the whole world it was found that the animal was not produced in sufficient quantities to enable the purchasers of horse flesh to obtain it at a moderate price. We were notoriously the first breeders of horses, and we had the best blood of horses; and all his noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) said was, that we should so far preserve our brood mares as to maintain our improved breed of horses. Although a good free trader, he could not see in what way the restriction, so far as his noble friend proposed, would interfere with its beneficial operation.

THE CONFERENCES AT VIENNA.

LORD LYNDHURST, in the absence of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, begged to ask the noble Marquess the President of the Council (meaning the Marquess of Lansdowne) a question which he and every Member of the Cabinet must be competent to answer. The noble Marquess was aware that by the treaty of the 2nd of December the parties to that treaty were bound to each other, in the event of peace not being concluded on the basis mentioned in the first article—that the Allied Powers would, without delay, deliberate on such measures as would be necessary to give effect to the principles agreed upon; and the question he had to ask was, whether this deliberation had been entered into at present? And, if so, whether this deliberation was entered into during the residence in Vienna of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) and the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, and if such deliberation had been brought to any result?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: When the noble and learned Lord calls on me to answer, as the organ of the Government in this House, and as President of the Council, he invokes a departed spirit. In the absence of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I am not able to answer, nor do I think that he would, if present, be able to state till the arrival of Lord John Russell, which will be in a few days, what has taken place in Vienna—if, indeed, anything has taken place.

The House adjourned till To-morrow.

BURIALS IN VAULTS—QUESTION.

GENERAL PEEL said, he wished to put the following question to the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary:—By a clause in the Burial Act a discretionary power was vested in the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to grant a licence in certain specified cases for interment in vaults. That power, however, was never exercised except on the report of a Government Inspector, but that report could never be obtained in time for use. He would, therefore, beg to ask the Secretary of State, whether in any town, where a prima facie case can be shown that such licence may be granted without detriment to the public health, he would cause an inspection to be at once made of all such vaults as the proprietors may wish to have reported upon?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated the effect of the provision in the Act with perfect accuracy. The discretionary power vested in the Secretary of State was qualified by law. He was to exercise it when it could be done without prejudice to the public health, and of course he would not feel justified in doing so, except upon the report of a medical inspector. Everything must depend upon the circumstances of the case, and it was necessary that a strong prima facie case should first be made out. The licence was obviously impracticable where a person was dead, because there would not be time to make previous inspection, and the Secretary of State was not justified by law in granting a licence without the report of a medical inspector.

INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS—QUESTION.

MR. W. LOCKHART said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it was his intention, in dealing with the income tax, to remove the injustice to which the proprietors of lands and houses in Scotland were subjected, in respect that no deductions were allowed to them for rates or taxes, in accordance with the practice in England and Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman seemed to be under the misapprehension that there was a difference in the law of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with regard to deductions allowed to landlords for the income tax. That was not the fact, as the law was precisely the same in all three countries. An allowance was made in respect of rates charged to the occupier, but none in respect of rates charged to the landlord. Those rates which must be by the law of England charged on the landlord, stood as part of his assessment, and were not deducted from it in England or Scotland more than in Ireland. It was, however, true that there were certain rates which in Scotland fell on the landlord and not on the tenant, but in England fell on the tenant and not on the landlord. In that respect, practically, the landlord in Scotland was under a disadvantage as compared with the landlord in England, but the law was precisely the same in both countries. It was not his intention to propose any change in this respect in the Bill that would be introduced.

THE CAMP AT ALDERSHOT—QUESTION.

COLONEL BOLDERO said, he begged to inquire of the First Lord of the Treasury what arrangements had been made as regarded the intended encampment at Aldershot, and whether the force would consist of cavalry, yeomanry, artillery, line, and militia regiments?

1787 Telegraphic Communication {COMMONS} with Balaklava—Question. 1788

Viscount PALMERSTON said, arrangements had been made for erecting at Aldershot huts for 10,000 men, the greater part of which were already prepared, and the rest would very speedily be ready. The intention was to have there twenty regiments of militia, some regiments of the line—how many was not exactly determined—three battalions of field artillery, and two or three troops of cavalry. It was not intended to have any yeomanry, as that force was called out only for eight days, and if they were sent to Aldershot, unless their head-quarters were very near, the whole time of training would be lost in marching, and it was not desirable to take the persons composing that force for too long a period from their natural avocations.

Colonel BOLDERO: If they volunteered for permanent duty?

CAVALRY IN THE CRIMEA—QUESTION.

Mr. NOEL said, that in consequence of the casualties of war, our cavalry force in the Crimea had been nearly destroyed, and was at present unable to take the field. It would be most satisfactory to know that reinforcements had been sent out, and he therefore begged to ask the hon. Under Secretary for War what steps had been taken to increase our cavalry force, and to maintain the effective establishment of the different regiments; and also, whether it was the intention of the Government to forward without delay, in steam transports, large draughts of the different cavalry regiments now in the Crimea?

Mr. FREDERICK PEEL said, the establishment of the cavalry force at the present time, as compared with its amount at the same time last year, was, he believed, just double, both with regard to men and horses. An arrangement had been made that each regiment of cavalry in this country should raise for active service about 120 men and 300 horses. The cavalry force in the Crimea had been increased by bringing from India two cavalry regiments which had passed through Egypt and had now reached their destination. In addition 550 men and double that number of horses were now on their passage from this country to the Crimea; and upwards of 1,100 men and horses had been ordered to proceed to the same destination. One of the ships which had been taken up for the conveyance of these reinforcements was a steamer; the others, he believed, were sailing vessels. He might further state that it was intended to form at Scutari a reserve of about 150 men and horses for each of the cavalry regiments now in the Crimea.

Mr. NOEL: Are those reserves to be forwarded by steam transports?

Mr. PEEL: It is very difficult to obtain steam transports at the present time, therefore some sailing vessels must be employed.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH BALAKLAVA—QUESTION.

Mr. LAYARD said, he understood the electric telegraph to Balaklava was to have been opened either yesterday or to-day. He wished to know if any information had been received from the seat of war by its means; and if so, whether the noble Lord had any objection to state what was the nature of that information? Also, whether the telegraph was to be open for the use of the public?

Viscount PALMERSTON: Sir, the hon. Gentleman has been correctly informed, the telegraph is open, and my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty received a message to-day and one yesterday; but it did not contain any news from the Crimea—it simply announced that the telegraph was open. I am not able to answer my hon. Friend's other question, as to whether any arrangements will be made for opening the use of the telegraph to others than the Government. I will give him an answer to that another day.

Mr. LAYARD: Then there is no information whether the bombardment of Sebastopol has been successful or not?

Viscount PALMERSTON: The telegraphic message did not bear upon that.

Sir CHARLES WOOD said, perhaps he might be permitted to state that he yesterday received by the telegraph a message from Sir Edmund Lyons, dated the day before, acknowledging the receipt of a communication from the Admiralty; and to-day another message from the consul at Bucharest, stating that he had no news to communicate.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, he begged to inquire if he rightly understood the First Lord of the Admiralty to say that the telegraph was entirely open from this country to Balaklava? If so, how long would the transmission of a message between the two points occupy?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, it was not open the whole of the way to Balaklava. The submarine telegraph was laid down from the Crimea to Varna; but there was no telegraph between Varna and Cape Kaliuga. As soon as the wires could be laid down along that distance the communication by electric telegraph would be complete. The message received yesterday, the 25th, from Sir Edmund Lyons, was dated the 24th.

MR. ROEBUCK: Then in twenty-four hours we could communicate with Balaklava. Under these circumstances would the noble Lord at the head of the Government think it within the scope of his duty, seeing the natural anxiety of the public upon the subject, to communicate without loss of time whatever might happen there?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I may state to the House that it is my intention to request my noble Friend at the head of the War Department to urge upon the commander of the forces to let us have every day some information of what is passing at the seat of war.

SPIRIT DUTIES (SCOTLAND AND IRELAND) BILL.

MR. FAGAN said, he begged to ask if it was intended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to amend the schedule of this Bill, so as to remove the objections made to it by the compounders, rectifiers and dealers in Spirits in Scotland and Ireland, on the ground that it subjected their stock in hand to the increased rate of duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the effect of an augmentation of the duty on spirits, on former occasions, had been to charge spirits, whether in bond or duty paid, in the hands of distillers, but not to charge spirits which were in the hands of wholesale dealers. It appeared, however, to the Government that there was no difference in principle between spirits in the hands of distillers and spirits in the hands of wholesale dealers, and they accordingly included both classes of persons in the Resolutions they had proposed to the House. In taking that step they were influenced by the information they had received as to the large quantity of spirits which had been taken out for consumption in Scotland and Ireland before the financial statement was made on the part of the Government. In the fortnight ending the 7th of April last the quantity of spirits upon which duty was paid in the district of South Argyll was 37,594 gallons; in Edinburgh, 86,494 gallons; Glasgow, 87,204 gallons; Linlithgow, 18,366 gallons; and Stirling, 39,182 gallons; while in the fortnight ending the 21st of April the quantity upon which duty was paid was, in the district of South Argyll, 105,462 gallons; in Edinburgh, 146,309 gallons; Glasgow, 876,690 gallons; Linlithgow, 72,593 gallons; and Stirling, 105,800 gallons. He found also with respect to Ireland that the amount of spirits upon which duty was paid in the fortnight ending April 7, 1855, was in Belfast, 77,928 gallons; in Cork, 43,064 gallons; in Dublin, 76,522 gallons; in Drogheda, 28,205 gallons; and in Waterford, 15,835 gallons; while in the fortnight ending the 21st of April, the quantity was in Belfast, 121,440 gallons; in Cork, 99,632 gallons; in Dublin, 145,623 gallons; in Drogheda, 60,660 gallons; and in Waterford, 71,200 gallons. It was clear, therefore, that the dealers, speculating upon some probable increase of the spirit duty, had taken a large quantity of spirits out of bond in the fortnight preceding the announcement of the budget, and this circumstance explained the intention of the Government to apply their Resolution to the wholesale dealers. He fully admitted the importance of precedents in matters of this kind. As they were now imposing a large additional duty upon spirits in Scotland and Ireland, it might perhaps seem somewhat unfair on the part of the Government to depart from the ordinary custom, and possibly when in Committee he might be enabled to modify his original proposition.

MR. DISRAELI said, he wished to know whether the same answer would apply to other articles on which the duties had been augmented?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, a considerable additional quantity of sugar had been taken out of bond, but only a small quantity of tea.

CONFERENCES AT VIENNA--QUESTION.

MR. BRIGHT: I wish, Sir, to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he is prepared to lay on the table of the House papers that will give full information as to the transactions that have taken place at Vienna, in order that at some early period the whole of this question and the condition of the country with regard to the war may be taken into consideration by the House? I observe that the Foreign Minister, in giving some information upon the subject in another place, has promised that all the papers connected with it shall be laid upon the table, and I trust that the same course will be followed in this House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : There is nothing, Sir, more reasonable or more common than that when a correspondence is communicated to one House of Parliament, it is communicated to the other House also; so that when the papers to which my hon. Friend has referred are laid on the table of the House of Lords, they will be laid on the table of the House of Commons likewise. I do not undertake to fix any particular day when the papers will be produced. My noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) has not yet returned home, and, though we have had telegraphic messages up to a particular date, I am not in a position to name the day on which the papers will be laid on the table. I can only say that no unnecessary delay will occur in giving to the House the fullest information.

MR. BRIGHT : Sir, I shall be prepared, if any undue delay takes place, to make a specific Motion on the subject.

MR. OTWAY said, he would take that opportunity of asking the noble Lord at the head of the Government, whether the French Ambassador, M. Drouyn de Lhuys, left Vienna at the same time as the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, or if he had left Vienna at all?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : I cannot say whether or not M. Drouyn de Lhuys left Vienna at the same time as my noble Friend, but I imagine that he has left by this time.

CUSTOMS DUTIES BILL.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he should not oppose the Bill at that stage, but should do so strongly in Committee, and at every subsequent stage. If it were not abandoned, he considered that it would create discontent all over the country.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he wished to call the attention of the House to what had fallen from the hon. Secretary to the Treasury on a former occasion, in reference to the imports of sugar from the West Indies. He admitted that there had been an increase in those imports, but the West India interest received more for the smaller quantity eight years ago than they had received for the larger quantity in the present year; the difference being, independent of the extra expense of producing a larger quantity 782,000*l.* That showed the depressed state of the West India interest, caused by the measures adopted by the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury bench, and under these circumstances it was not right to lay an increased duty on sugar, which would certainly cause a further loss to the West India interest to the amount, he should think, of 160,000*l.* a year at least. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the duty on tea was to be reduced at the end of the war by the action of the present Bill, while no similar provision was made with respect to the duties on coffee and sugar, which were the produce of our colonies, for which, he thought, we ought to feel a greater regard than for the Chinese.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would explain the reasons which determined the Government to make the distinction noticed by the hon. Gentleman between the duty on tea and the duties on sugar and coffee. An Act which received the assent of Parliament at the beginning of the Session suspended the further reduction of the duty on tea, but that suspension was limited in the manner expressed in the present Bill—namely, until a year after the conclusion of the war. It was therefore thought in imposing a further duty on tea, that the same rule should be applied. He had, however, hesitated to extend that rule to the duties on coffee and sugar, inasmuch as such a course might appear too much to interfere with the discretion of Parliament in afterwards dealing with those duties. But he would admit that the matter was open to reconsideration, and if, in Committee on the Bill, it should be the general desire to consider the additional duties on tea and coffee merely as war taxes, he should not be disposed to oppose the proposition.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that with reference to a speech of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury on a former evening, he must say, that the same causes which had recently rendered the cultivation of sugar profitable in the Mauritius had also operated in the West Indies. Twenty years ago, Jamaica alone produced 70,000 tons of sugar per annum; while now it only produced 22,000, and for those the net receipt per ton was only half what it was at the former period, owing to the diminution of price and the increase in the cost of cultivation. He thought, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman was hardly justified in saying that the condition of Jamaica was one of increasing prosperity. In fact, there were only two West Indian colonies which had obtained a good supply of labour which were otherwise than in a state of the greatest possible depression. Jamaica, in particular, was in a comparative state of ruin.

MR. GREGSON said, he very much regretted the absence of reciprocity in our dealings with the Chinese, for while we taxed the commodities imported from them at the rate of 180 per cent., we insisted on their taking ours at a Customs duty of only 6 per cent. He feared that the increase of the duty on tea would materially check our trade with China, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not derive the additional revenue he anticipated either from the increased duty on tea or that on sugar.

MR. T. BARING said, it was a source of considerable regret to him, the selection of articles made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the imposition of additional Customs duties; he would admit, nevertheless, that the Customs duties ought to bear their fair share in the additional taxation demanded by the position of the country. Two of the articles chosen for increased taxation were the productions of our own colonies, which would therefore suffer from any decrease in their consumption. While, owing to an Act of Parliament having been passed only at the commencement of the Session, to arrest the fall of the duty on the third article—tea—those interested in the trade naturally supposed that no further alteration in the duty would take place in the course of the present year, and had sent out their orders under that impression. He thought the fair method of dealing with the Customs duties would have been to have raised the whole 10 per cent., which upon the 20,000,000*l.* to which these taxes amounted would have given the Chancellor of the Exchequer all the additional income he desired to raise, from this source. Luxuries would then have paid as much as necessaries, and the measure would not have been open to the objection of selecting for increased taxation only articles of general consumption; and articles which were either the produce of our own colonies, or upon which there was every reason to believe that no increased duties would be levied during this year.

VOL. CXXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. HEYWORTH said, if they placed a duty upon articles of general consumption, it was an inevitable effect that their price should be increased, and their consumption diminished. Not only so, but trade in general must be diminished. For these reasons he regarded Customs duties in general as not based on sound financial principles, and believed that we ought to raise the additional revenue required by direct, rather than indirect taxation.

MR. LAING said, he objected so strongly to the Bill, that, if he were supported, he should be ready to divide the House against it. The principle on which it went involved an entire reversal of Sir Robert Peel's commercial and financial policy, which had been carried out during the last ten years with such success, by the cautious and gradual substitution of direct for indirect taxation, and the removal of duties on articles of general consumption. In fiscal matters two and two did not always make four. If, by an addition to the taxation on articles of general consumption a corresponding increase could be obtained in the revenue, no great objection could be urged to such a proposal in a time of war like the present; but all experience showed that it was perfectly possible to go on increasing the taxation on articles of consumption for an indefinite period, without in the end at all benefiting the revenue; nay, it might be with a positive loss. The plan suggested by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) of adding a percentage to the Customs duties had been tried, and had failed. It was on the failure of that policy that Sir Robert Peel resolved to meet the necessities of the State by the imposition of an income tax, and at the same time to reduce the Customs duties. What had been the results? Why, that while in the eleven years from 1842 to 1853 the balance of taxes repealed over taxes imposed was 6,716,000*l.*, the revenue had actually increased by 6,891,000*l.* Nay, more, during that period nearly 9,000,000*l.* out of the 21,000,000*l.* raised by the Customs duties at its commencement had been repealed, and yet the revenue from this source had not suffered to the extent of more than 1,000,000*l.* He contended that nothing could be more impolitic than by this Bill to commence the reversal of a policy which had led to such an expansion of trade and commerce, and had so materially contributed to the prosperity of the working classes. If by this means they permanently crippled the resources of the country, it would be a poor consolation that for the first year or two of what might be a long war, they had been able to extract a slight increase of Customs duties from the pockets of the people. Besides, the moral and social effects of the adoption of Sir Robert Peel's policy were of even greater importance than its financial and commercial results. The upper classes, and those who lived by labour of head rather than of hand, had shown, by submitting to the income tax, that they were ready not only to bear their fair share of fiscal burdens, but, if necessary, even to make sacrifices in order to lighten their pressure upon the working population; and their free trade measures had done more to remove discontent among the lower classes, than all the political changes they could name. Now, he would ask, was it wise or safe, then, in the midst of a European war, and with the feeling now prevalent against the upper classes for their mismanagement, to reverse a financial policy from which the labouring population had reaped such advantage, and, before we had submitted to as heavy a property tax as our forefathers sustained in the last war, seek to extract from those who could worst afford it, 1,000,000*l.* or 2,000,000*l.* annually in the shape of increased duties on tea, coffee, and sugar. An augmentation of indirect taxation ought to be resorted to only under extreme necessity; and rather than adopt such a course there were two other alternatives, either of which would be far preferable. One was to raise the additional 1,500,000*l.* or 2,000,000*l.* that were requisite by a further increase of the income tax—an impost which, however liable to objections, pressed more lightly on the springs of industry and the resources of the country than Customs duties. No doubt there was a practical limit to the imposition of direct taxation; but as it would most probably be necessary next year, should the present state of things continue, to raise the income tax to 10 per cent—the amount levied in the last war—would it not be better to fix it at 8 or 9 per cent now, instead of embarking in a retrograde course, and one fraught with such disastrous consequences? The other alternative open to them, and the one which he should have preferred, would have been to lay on further Customs duties to procure this 1,500,000*l.*; let them raise the 16,000,000*l.* loan to 18,000,000*l.*, or even to 20,000,000*l.* The country was yet in a provisional state in regard to the war, and the progress of the summer was likely to throw light on our future position; but it was to be hoped that if the war was to continue, we should not go on throwing away 30,000,000*l.* per annum in prosecuting land campaigns against an overwhelming military Power in its own territory. As a naval Power, we should surely apply ourselves to operations by sea, by which our present enormous military expenditure would be reduced. However that might be, in the existing uncertainty as to the probable duration of the war, it would be most injudicious to attack that great system of commercial policy which had been reared by the labours of the last ten years; and he must therefore give his negative to the second reading of this Bill to record his strong disapproval of its principle.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he regretted as much as the hon. Member himself the necessity of raising the duties on commodities which entered so largely into the consumption of the people as tea, coffee, and sugar. But it was not necessarily involved in the adoption of free trade that they should insist that, under all circumstances, the burden of the taxation of the country should be borne by direct taxation, and that there should be no attempt to distribute the burden equally amongst all classes, by placing a portion of it upon the country in the shape of indirect taxes. On the contrary, it was clear that, unless they did so, the pressure of the direct taxation would be intolerable. While, therefore, he trusted that the House would adhere to the policy of late years, he could not regard this Bill as in any degree inconsistent with the principle of free trade. Nor was it true, as had been asserted in the course of the debate, that this was the first occasion on which the indirect taxation of the country had been increased of late years; because only last year an additional duty was imposed on malt. With regard to the other remarks of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, he must say that he thought Parliament would have betrayed its duty had it thrown the whole burden of the war on posterity in the shape of a loan, and not shown that we were ready to bear part of it ourselves by submitting to additional taxes while the war lasted. With respect to the proposition for increasing the income tax to 10 per cent, he (Mr. Labouche) had a strong feeling that that tax did not press on the rich alone, but that it fell most severely on a class of persons having small incomes and but little able to bear it, and that it likewise pressed on the springs of industry, not perhaps in a very direct, but in a very perceptible manner. He did not think they ought hastily, and, without the pressure of some great emergency, at once to raise the income tax to the full practicable amount before they had endeavoured to equalise the burden of the war taxation by raising a portion of it from the indirect taxes. With respect to the budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer he was prepared to give it a general support, believing that it was, with a single exception, based upon sound principles. He must say, however, that he entertained considerable doubts as to that part of it by which it was proposed to pledge this country to raise £,000,000l. a year, after the resumption of peace, for the purpose of paying off the debt now proposed to be incurred. He thought that the Legislature ought not to commit itself to a pledge unless there was good reason to believe that it would be kept: but he confessed that he entertained some doubt whether, on the resumption of peace, that fate would attend the one to which he was now referring.

CAPTAIN LAFFAN said, he did not intend to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill before the House, because the amendment which he wished to see introduced might be made in Committee. He saw no reason why sugar should be taxed in a different manner from wine, or any other article. On wine of all kinds there was a uniform duty of 1s. per gallon; but the duty imposed on high-priced sugars was different from that on low-priced sugars. He thought that the rule which obtained with respect to wine should be applied to sugar. The only reason which he could conceive why it was not applied to sugar was, that we made no wine in England, and, therefore, there was no interest sufficiently represented in that House to cause differential duties to be imposed upon the various qualities of wine; but it was otherwise in the case of sugar, for we had in England a large number of sugar refiners, whose interest it was to cause the duty upon low-priced sugars to be small, and the duties upon high-priced sugars, or those which passed through the greatest number of processes in their manufacture, to be large. Let the House consider what was the effect of these differential duties. He knew several estates in the colonies upon which large sums had been expended in the improvement of machinery. Upon one estate in the Mauritius with which he was more particularly acquainted, 30,000l. had recently been expended in machinery. But within the last year orders had been sent from England to the parties managing the estate to let a portion of the valuable machinery lie idle and rust, and to cultivate on the estate, which was capable of producing sugar white as snow, none but low-priced sugars, in order to escape the higher duty imposed upon the best article in this country. He would propose, therefore, that instead of the differential duties now laid before the House there should be a uniform duty upon sugar, and that the amount of that uniform duty should be such as would give an equal return to the Exchequer.

MR. MALINS said, he would admit that direct taxation would be the best of all taxation if all men were equal in point of riches; but a large proportion of the people of this country were in such a struggling state, that the sight of the tax-gatherer was positively distressing to them. The House should, therefore, be slow in acceding to the principle of a large increase of direct taxation. He (Mr. Malins) approved generally of the principle of the Budget, and he was not opposed, therefore, to the moderate increase proposed on the amount of the income tax. But he would be prepared to give any large extension of that tax at a future occasion his most strenuous opposition, as he could not consent to an extension of the principle of direct taxation much further. Considering the disturbance caused to trade and commerce by the augmentation of Customs duties, and also considering that the great operation in which the country was engaged might be the means of effecting a peace, he questioned whether it would not have been the better course to have taken the loan for 20,000,000l. instead of 16,000,000l. That would give the sum, or nearly the sum, required, and produce no disturbance in the trade and commerce of the country. If the war was to be carried on for years, as it was possible it might, then there should inevitably be some compromise between direct and indirect taxation; but while there was any hope, even the faintest, of peace, he thought it would be the lesser evil of the two to raise 4,000,000l., or 5,000,000l., by way of an addition to the loan, than disturb the commercial transactions of the country, or to increase still more the income tax, which had been doubled last year. At the same time he admitted, that, in his opinion, to put an increased duty on tea, coffee, and sugar, was to proceed on a right principle, and he hoped that it would not be productive of the disturbance anticipated by commercial men in this country. Under these circumstances he gave the Budget his general support.

SIR WILLIAM CLAY said, he considered that the course pursued by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in proposing an increase of the duties upon tea, coffee, and sugar, was not at variance with the principles of free trade. There was nothing protective in the duties which it was intended to increase. The amount or rate of a duty did not determine its protective quality. Duties were only protective when they were imposed on articles of foreign production at a higher rate than on similar articles of home production; thus giving a bonus to the home producer at the expense of the consumer. He admitted that, theoretically, direct taxation was to be preferred to indirect taxation; but it was impossible—at least impracticable—under the present state of things to confine themselves to direct taxation. During the last twenty years, no less than 25,000,000*l.* per annum had been deducted from the indirect taxation of the country, which pressed chiefly upon the humbler classes, while up to last year almost every fresh tax imposed belonged to the system of direct taxation, which was borne to a great extent by the wealthier classes of the community. It was their duty, therefore, in providing for the expenses of the war, not to confine their attention wholly to direct taxation, and so allow those classes to escape who could only be touched by indirect taxation. He, therefore, approved of the Budget, because it increased the indirect taxation of the country as well as the direct. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) that the amount raised by way of loan should have been 20,000,000*l.* He believed there were the strongest economical, moral, and social reasons for endeavouring, to the utmost possible extent, to defray the annual expenditure by taxation rather than by loan. Let the nation feel what it was to be at war, and do not lessen the disposition to peace by diminishing the burdens of war.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he could not view without apprehension the beginning of a course of policy opposed to that of Sir Robert Peel in 1841, which had so effectually restored the finances of the country. This nation, high taxed as it was, had been obliged to compete with low-taxed nations in point of manufactured productions, and it never could have done so had it not been for that policy proposed by Sir Robert Peel. The manufacturers of this country were now in a very different position from that which they had occupied during the last war, for the continental manufacturers were not then able to compete with them. At the present time, however, the capital of the continent was employed in manufactures, and our manufacturers ought not to be placed at a disadvantage, as compared with their rivals. He regretted, therefore, that the 1,500,000*l.* increased Customs duties had not been raised by an addition to the income tax; more especially as the duties in question were imposed upon articles, tea, coffee, and sugar, where they would be felt most severely by the poorer classes.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I rise to do an act of justice to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because it has been stated by the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing), and by other hon. Members, that the House is now about to take a first step in a retrograde course; and hon. Gentlemen have described with justice the mischiefs attendant upon such a course. I am sorry to say, however, that this is not the first step in this direction, because I am the unfortunate person whose duty it was last Session to propose the first step of retrogression, and the first step in the reversal of the great work of the last twelve or fourteen years. It is quite true, as has been stated by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir W. Clay), that the proposed customs duties do not contain the elements of protection, and that so far as that great and capital feature is concerned, we have not reached the point at which we are compelled to encounter that very serious question. Our work has been a double one. Our first and greatest object has been to eradicate from our laws the bad principle of protection, yet, over and above that capital purpose, Parliament has gradually, cautiously, and successfully endeavoured to diminish the pressure of duties upon the great articles of consumption. Last year we took the first step to undo that policy when we laid an additional duty upon sugar and a large additional duty upon malt. These were very great evils, undoubtedly, and I am bound to say that I do not think we shall stop there, but that, on the contrary, if it is unfortunately incumbent upon the House of Commons for several successive years to add largely to the taxation of the country for the purposes of the war, we shall, rely upon it, again have to face the question of protection. Proposals will be made, and have been made to-night by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) and others, which, if they were adopted, would let in the thin end of the wedge of protection. Undoubtedly, there are some duties in our tariff which partake in a limited degree of the principle of protection, but the hon. Gentleman gave my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer bad advice when, instead of selecting the articles best able to bear additional duties, such as tea, coffee, and sugar, he entirely declined to discriminate, and recommended my right hon. Friend to take the wine duty, which is already the scandal of our tariff and prohibits nine-tenths of the wine of Europe, and puts his 10 per cent upon it—when he recommends him, also, to put 10 per cent additional upon tobacco, the duty upon which is so large that with every precaution it is hardly possible to keep down smuggling—and when he recommends him also to lay 10 per cent upon timber, which must bring in again that element of protection. I am sorry to be a prophet of evil, but I am afraid, if this necessity should continue for two or three years—and if this war should last, instead of diminishing it will grow—the Government of the day, whoever may be in office, will probably find itself so hard driven and in such straits for mere money, that it may be obliged to propose to Parliament to raise money by that most extravagant of all means of raising money—the restoration of protective duties; and in some form or other, protective duties may come to be restored about the time when the last Protectionist in the country shall have died. I believe the number of gentlemen holding this opinion has enormously diminished since the minority of fifty-three voted at the end of 1852; that a multitude of those who struggled for protection would not now take it back if you were to give it to them; and that if there ever comes a time when protection in any shape is restored, it will come by a compulsion stronger than ourselves, and due to the necessities of the war. That will be a most unfortunate thing. But there are some who contend that our increased necessities ought to be met by direct taxation. Sir, that view is purely theoretical and visionary. It is not the abstract qualities and justice of a tax that enables you to raise money from direct taxation. So far as regards justice and equality, there cannot, I think, be a fairer tax than the house tax; yet the house tax is that tax the raising of which is attended with the greatest difficulty in this country, and although any man who will reason upon it would say that a house tax ought to be one of the main resources of our revenue, yet it will be found that it is the source of only a limited and insignificant extent of income. I do not believe that, as it now stands, the house tax supplies more than 1½ per cent of the whole taxation, and yet I doubt whether there is not more dissatisfaction and discontent in raising this tax than in the levying of very much larger sums in other forms. Sir, I cannot disregard these considerations. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer possesses a powerful engine in the income tax, but he must not attempt to strain it too much. I hope he will remember how much difficulty there is in the whole structure of the income tax, how very reluctant the House has been to give its sanction to the income tax in its present form at all, and how impossible it has been to find any man who would undertake the task of altering that form. Some gentlemen say they prefer indirect taxation, others prefer direct taxation, and others say, I should prefer a loan. My right hon. Friend has, unfortunately, as I conceive, provided the means of meeting all these tastes. Those who like indirect taxation have got indirect taxation; those who prefer direct taxation have got direct taxation; and those who like a loan have got a loan. And although there are some gentlemen who are vexed at the smallness of that loan, and who say that my right hon. Friend ought to have asked for a round sum of 20,000,000 $\text{l}$ ., yet I will venture to remind them that he is not so very far from it, because, although my right hon. Friend only asked for 16,000,000 $\text{l}$ . in Consols and terminable annuities, yet there is a little item which has been overlooked of 3,000,000 $\text{l}$ . of Exchequer bills, which my right hon. Friend has judiciously asked for, to vote as a supply in reserve, and it would not, I think, be a venturesome prophecy to say that he will have occasion to use it, and that those who are so anxious that 20,000,000 $\text{l}$ . should be borrowed will not be very much dissatisfied if they find that the sum will amount to 19,000,000 $\text{l}$ . Sir, I feel the gravity of the steps that have been and are now taken. I feel that we ought to make every effort to diminish the pressure that bears upon the people by the augmentation of indirect taxation; but it is fair to ourselves, and to those whom we represent, that we should fairly realize this truth, that, as in several successive years we have taken off many millions of taxation without loss, so we may now be in a position in which it will be necessary to impose many millions of taxation, without any real gain. In other words, as by the process in which we have been for some years engaged, at a small loss to the revenue we have added greatly to the wealth of the country, so, by the process which we are now commencing, we may, at little gain to the revenue, be about to take much from the wealth of the country and the comforts of the people. No man surely could suppose that we could undertake a war of such gigantic dimensions without anticipating these evils, and I hope we shall not attempt to escape the necessities of the war by falling back upon the miserable expedient of trusting exclusively to loans. This House, I feel convinced, will not commit any treason to its constituents so gross as to evade the difficulty by resorting to the unlimited use of the funding system, an invention which has been a misfortune and a curse to mankind, and which although in particular countries it has been of some use and benefit, yet, when we look at the state into which it has brought the national finances of most of the States throughout the world, when we consider the permanent mortgages which it has created upon the industry of all countries, and, above all, when we consider the miserable, unjust, pernicious, and unjustifiable wars in which this expedient has enabled countries to embark, I look upon this as the source from which more misfortunes have flowed forth upon mankind than, perhaps, from any other. I thought it was only fair to my right hon. Friend to attempt to relieve him from the censure which has been thus cast on him. I think in whatever way we may attempt to deal with the difficulties of our position, the very worst course we can take is to shut our eyes and adopt expedients, which will tend to mislead the public mind, and prevent it from fully appreciating the gravity of those difficulties.

MR. ALCOCK said, had the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer increased the income tax to 10 per cent it would have been unnecessary to add taxes on tea and sugar, or to raise a sum by Exchequer bills. There ought to have been a graduated income tax, taking in all classes. The working people had petitioned to be included in those classes which contributed through the income tax to defray the burdens of the war, because they had sense enough to see that, if duties were laid on tobacco and tea and sugar, they would have to pay the largest share of the amount. He was astonished to hear the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) have the boldness to ask Government to add 10 per cent to the duties on necessary articles of consumption. His principle of finance was to lay the burden where it could best be borne, and to make all pay in proportion to their means. He was prepared to admit the difficulties in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was placed, and he was not disposed to offer any obstruction to the proposed measures.

MR. ALEXANDER HASTIE said, he thought it would have been better for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the second year of the war, to have borrowed 2,000,000*l.* more, rather than to have disturbed the trades in tea, sugar, and other articles, which were to be subjected to higher duties. He wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the classification of the duties on sugar, which had been found to operate very injuriously. He believed the Bill under discussion was the great blot upon the Budget.

MR. W. J. FOX said, that in reference to what had been stated respecting the operation of direct and indirect taxation, he considered that direct taxation affected all classes subject to the impost equally; but that indirect taxation touched very lightly the rich, while it pressed very heavily indeed on the poorer classes. One objection to the income tax was stated to be its inequality; but it could not be compared with the inequality of the tax on sugar, tea, and coffee. Look at the proportion which the outlay on those articles formed in the expenditure of the operatives and the proportion which it formed in the expenditure of those who had large establishments! No doubt the income tax fell heavily upon persons of small incomes, but if the Customs duties were removed from articles of consumption the saving to those persons would outweigh the income tax. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had said that if the war should continue the course of events would inevitably drive us again to a system of protection. This should operate as a warning against their going any further than was absolutely necessary in a course of taxation that would lead to such a result. If there should be a necessity for increasing indirect taxation, every effort should be made to stave it off as long as possible, and if the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) divided on the question he should feel bound to support him. In taking that course he would not be actuated by any principle opposed to the most liberal grants of public money for the prosecution of the war; but he felt bound to protest against the main burden of the war being thrown upon the poorer portion of the community.

MR. EWART said, he should have preferred a small extension of the system of loans to a mode of taxation which was in reality sinning against the principle of sound political economy. He wished to speak as the advocate of the poorer classes, because he was convinced that in these indirect taxes they paid in greater proportion than those above them.

SPIRIT DUTIES (SCOTLAND AND IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD NAAS said, that the experience of past times was not satisfactory with regard to an increase in the spirit duties; and he wished to know if Government had the intention or the power to take any additional steps for the suppression of illicit distillation in Ireland. He believed that any increase in that practice would be attended with the most pernicious effects. He also wished to know if Government had any intention to equalise the duties on spirits throughout the United Kingdom, for he was convinced that such a plan was not only possible, but that it would be attended with a great increase to the revenue. It would also remove many great anomalies, and have the best possible effect in many other respects.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord, as far as the pernicious effects of illicit distillation were concerned; but the experience of the measure of last year, in consequence of the improved social condition of that portion of the United Kingdom, was very favourable. If it was necessary for the purpose of collecting the additional duty, the provisions of the last Act would be regularly enforced.

TESTAMENTARY JURISDICTION BILL.

MR. MALINS said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He trusted that the House would not consider that he wished to perpetuate any abuse in these courts, or in any matter connected with the administration of justice. He would yield to no man in his desire to improve that administration, but there was a great difference between improving and abolishing. If his hon. and learned Friend (the Solicitor General) had, instead of abolishing these courts, confined himself to making their practice as perfect as possible, he and those who acted with him would have lent the hon. and learned Gentleman their best assistance to effect his object. But Government refused to take warning by what had occurred last year, and this year had brought forward a measure which, though differing considerably in some of its details, was essentially the same as the Bill of last year. Government, it appeared, had deliberately made up their minds last year to a particular course, but this year they had departed, to a certain extent, from that course, and this was a good reason why Government was not entitled to call upon Parliament to sanction the Bill before the House. The question was one of great difficulty, and involved a subject which of necessity could be but little known to Members of that House. He would briefly state what was the object of Government by this Bill, and what was the object that, in his opinion, ought to be kept in view. The object of the Bill was to totally abolish the existing Testamentary Courts and the Ecclesiastical Courts of the country, and to transfer their business to the Court of Chancery. Now, this business was the testamentary business of England, involving the right to the whole of the personal property in the country, and it was proposed to include also all real property. This must, sooner or later, affect every person possessing property to the amount of 20*l.*, at which sum it was proposed to fix the obligation for taking out probates. What was the present law? When property was left by will no executor could act until the will was proved; and when this was done the Court issued the probate by which the executor was empowered to take possession, and to ad-nister the whole of the property of the testator. In case no will existed, and the widow did not take out letters of administration, the Court usually granted letters to the next of kin. Now, the number of wills proved in 1852 was 18,703, and 7,068 letters of administration were taken out, making a total, in round numbers, of upwards of 25,000 testamentary grants in one year. The probate duty paid in that year amounted to nearly 1,000,000*l.* sterling. Three Commissions had reported on this subject, and they all concurred in one principle—with which he and those who acted with him also agreed—that the time was come when it was necessary to abolish the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of these courts. The Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury was appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Judge of the Prerogative Court of York by the Archbishop of York; but the business of those courts was of a temporal character, and, therefore, the courts themselves ought to be temporal and not ecclesiastical. This Bill proposed that the courts should no longer be ecclesiastical; that the Archbishops should no longer have the appointment of the Judges, and that the business of these courts should be transferred to the Court of Chancery. But upon what principle, for what reason should the transfer take place? Wills must be proved in some court or other, but why should that court be the Court of Chancery? The hon. and learned Solicitor General told them the probate of a will and the construction of a will were so much mixed up together, that the authority to deal with such a matter ought to be in the hands of one court, but he (Mr. Malins) thought he could satisfy the House that proving a will and determining its construction were totally different things. Questions of the greatest nicety and delicacy often arose as to who should take possession of a man's property immediately after his death. If the House would consider the great opportunities that existed for fraud with respect to the management of a deceased person's property he felt satisfied they would be slow to make an alteration which would have the effect of sweeping away the existing system and an existing order of men, whose experience in the business was a great security against the commission of fraud. The number of probates granted in one year was about 25,000; but questions as to the construction of wills did not exceed two per cent of that number.

A Return which he had, showed that the whole bills filed in the Court of Chancery from October, 1853, to October, 1854, amounted to 2,900; and from October last to April, 1,200 to 1,300. If the House would reflect that bills filed in Chancery had relation to every kind of engagement between man and man, they would admit—the whole of those bills not exceeding 2,900 in one year—that one-sixth was a moderate estimate for the suits with regard to wills. There was, therefore, only one in fifty of the wills subject to probate with regard to which any litigation took place. If he were right, what became of the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman that the probate of wills and questions as to the construction of wills should come before the same court. But to revert to the position assumed by the hon. and learned Solicitor General, he must contend that the probate of a will and the construction were not inseparable; on the contrary, they were two distinct things: and even suppose they agreed to send the two matters to the same court, the practical working of such a plan would still be as it was at present. The will would have to be proved in the first instance, and then, if there was any dispute about its construction, the parties would have to begin de novo, as it were, and set forth all that had been done in the preliminary pleadings. Practically speaking, therefore, there would be two courts in operation under this Bill; at one period of the day the court would be a court of probate, at another a court of construction; and since it could not be maintained that the act of proving a will was inseparably connected with the act of construction, he was at a loss to discover the advantage to be obtained under the change proposed by this Bill. Another point which the hon. and learned Solicitor General urged in support of his plan for placing the two things in the hands of one court was this—he said it was highly desirable that the court to whom such matters were referred, should have the power of dealing with the estate during the period that a will was under contest. Now, was that a sufficient reason for a sweeping change in the law? Was the House aware of the number of wills contested in the course of a year? Why, in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, out of 12,000 wills proved in a year, on an average not more than forty were contested, and, except in rare cases, such as that of Mr. Dyce Sem-

bre, where the points involved were of a peculiar and unusual nature, the contests were mostly brought to a termination within the space of two or three months. The fact was, the Ecclesiastical Courts had become unpopular with the country from circumstances beyond their own control; abuses had crept into them in connection with the patronage which they gave to the archbishops; but those abuses he certainly did not consider were a sufficient ground for abolishing the courts themselves. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, in introducing the measure, dwelt at some length upon the great abuses which had occurred, such as the appointments of Mr. Moore, of Mr. Manners Sutton, of the son of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, and of the grandson of the present Archbishop of Canterbury. But there was not a proctor or practitioner in that court who did not lament that such a state of things had existed, and was not as anxious to prevent their recurrence as his hon. and learned Friend. These cases had, however, nothing to do with the practice in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and it might just as well be said that because three or four years ago great abuses had existed in connection with the Court of Chancery that court ought to be abolished, as to say that the Ecclesiastical Courts ought to be done away with because certain abuses had been permitted with regard to them. There certainly were abuses, but they were capable of an easy remedy, and nothing could be more unjustifiable than to attempt to abolish the existing state of things, unless the necessity for doing so was shown to be of an overwhelming nature. As his hon. and learned Friend had stated, various Committees and Commissions had been appointed to inquire into the subject of the proceedings and practice of the Court of Chancery, and the result of their inquiries showed that it was principally the machinery which was defective and required remodelling. A Commission was issued by the Government of Lord John Russell in 1851, who made their Report in 1853, and the changes that were introduced in consequence of the Report of that Commission made the Court of Chancery as effective as any which existed in this country. In 1851 the Government of Lord Derby issued a Commission to a learned body of men to inquire into the system and practice of pleading in the Courts of Chancery, and the law and jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical and other Courts in relation to matters testamentary. In that Commission were to be found the names of Sir John Romilly, Lord Justice Turner, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, Sir William Page Wood, Sir John Dodson, Dr. Lushington, the Queen's Advocate, Mr. Justice Crampton, the Solicitor General, the right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), his hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), and Messrs. J. Rolt and W. James, of the Chancery bar, all men distinguished for learning and ability, and of various parties in politics, so that the Commission could not be charged with any political bias. That Commission came to the conclusion that it was not expedient to transfer the jurisdiction of matters testamentary to the Court of Chancery. At page 16 of that Report, after giving their reasons, and very fully, they expressed the following as the deliberate conclusion at which they had arrived:—

“We think, therefore, that the interests of the public would not be consulted by the transfer to the Court of Chancery of the uncontested testamentary business. It could not, we think, safely be so transferred as part of the general business of that court; and if transferred to a separate department (which for all substantial purposes would be a separate court), the transfer would be attended with all the inconveniences without any of the advantages incident to the constitution of a distinct court.”

He wanted to know of what utility it was to issue Commissions and obtain the opinion of the most learned men, if the Government of the day were to set that opinion at nought, and bring in a measure diametrically opposed to their advice, especially upon such a matter as this, which was one affecting the property of every individual in the community? Now, he would ask the attention of the House to the evidence given before the Commission. The bar at Doctors' Commons consisted of an exclusive body of practitioners, advocates, and proctors. No one but a proctor could prove a will, and no one but an advocate could be heard in the courts at Doctors' Commons. The Commissioners, however, called before them some eminent members of the profession—solicitors who were now excluded from practice in these courts, but upon whom the present Bill proposed to confer the right to practise in them. The evidence of these gentlemen was, in his opinion, entitled to peculiar weight, and he thought the House would also attach considerable importance to the petition he had presented that evening, signed by 163 of the most eminent solicitors in London, and 111 of the first firms of Bankers and Merchants, who expressed their opinion that the exclusive body in Doctors' Commons should be maintained as a protection to the public, and who repudiated the boon which the hon. and learned Solicitor General proposed to confer upon them by the Bill now under discussion. The first witness to whose evidence he would refer was Mr. Lavie, of the firm of Oliverson, Lavie, and Peachey, a distinguished commercial lawyer, who was examined at considerable length. Mr. Lavie, when asked his opinion as to the expediency of opening the business of probate to solicitors generally, instead of restricting it to proctors, said he entertained a very strong impression that it was most undesirable; that it would be very prejudicial to the public and very much regretted hereafter, if such business were thrown open to attorneys; and he proceeded to state that, according to his experience, the business, particularly with respect to probates, was extremely well done in Doctors' Commons, and that he did not know that it could be better transacted in any other place, although there were some details with respect to which improvements might be introduced. Mr. Lavie added, that he thought the check with regard to the respectability of practitioners in the courts of Doctors' Commons was a material safeguard to the public, and that the admission of attorneys, who resided in distant parts of the country, to prove wills, would be attended with very dangerous and mischievous results. This Bill, however, not only proposed that attorneys in any part of the country might prove wills, but that they might send up wills by post for proof, without attending themselves at all. Mr. Lavie further stated, that in a case where fraudulent wills had been presented to the Bank of England the perpetrator of the fraud had had the greatest difficulty in obtaining the assistance of respectable proctors, and had never gone a second time to the same proctor; while, if he could have resorted to any attorney in a remote part of the country, he would have been enabled to carry out his designs with much greater ease. The charges, Mr. Lavie said, seemed to him to be particularly moderate, but he stated that he regarded the safety of the public as the most important consideration; and that he did not think it would be preserved if all attorneys were allowed to prove wills. Mr. Lavie further added, that he considered it very expedient to leave Doctors' Commons much as it was, making such improvements as might easily be effected. He (Mr. Malins) would also ask hon. Members to refer at their leisure to the evidence of Mr. Young, of the firm of Desborough and Young, who was one of the most important witnesses examined upon the subject. Mr. Freshfield, the solicitor to the Bank of England, was also examined, and he wished to remind the House that the Bank had taken a very decided view against the Bill. Mr. Freshfield, in reply to a question as to whether he thought it would be desirable to throw the courts open to solicitors, said it appeared to him, confining his attention to the question of probate in London, that it would be attended with no advantage to open the courts to attorneys, but the contrary; that he did not think such a course would add any facilities whatever to the public; that he did not think it would diminish the expense; and that he did not think the business would be so well done. He also said that he thought it would be much better to entrust the business to a small body of practitioners, that body being under the control of the court. He went on to state that the question was not one of excluding attorneys, but admitting them for the first time; and that the control exercised by the court over its officers could not be so well exercised over a large body; that his impression was, that the present system was one which attained accuracy in a very high degree. He further said that the Bank of England had under its notice about 4,200 probates and letters of administration per annum, one-sixth of the number being letters of administration, and he could not speak too highly of the accuracy with which they were prepared. That was remarkably strong testimony in favour of the mode in which business was transacted in Doctors' Commons; and the 163 gentlemen whose petition he had presented to the House also expressed their satisfaction on that point. In 1832 the father of Mr. Freshfield gave equally emphatic evidence in favour of the system pursued at Doctors' Commons. A proposition was, however, now made for the entire abolition of that system, for the purpose of throwing the business into the Court of Chancery. The court was to be transferred he knew not where, nor did, he believed, the Solicitor General. The wills were to be deposited he knew not where, nor did either the Solicitor General or the Lord Chancellor. This system, which gave so much satisfaction, was to be abolished, as it appeared to him, merely for the sake of change; and the effect of that change would be to throw a great number of persons upon the world, and put the country to the expense of something like 100,000*l.* a year for compensation to gentlemen for not performing their duties when they were perfectly competent and willing to perform them with satisfaction to the public. Amendment was, as he had previously said, required; but the hon. and learned Gentleman would be satisfied with nothing less than destruction, and now proposed to abolish, at one fell swoop, a system which had been conducted for six centuries, and adapted itself to the requirements of the times, and to begin the world anew with a system which it would take a century to get in order. Where was the business to be conducted? The Government were not prepared with any plan for building new courts in places which would be the most convenient for the practitioners. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Commissioner of Works had told them that he was not aware of any place that would be fit for the purpose. There could not be a greater advantage to the administration of the law than to place the Judge in the centre of his business, and he might mention one fact in illustration of this assertion. Four years ago the Court of Chancery always sat at Westminster Hall in term time, and at Lincoln's Inn during the vacation. The business was so much better conducted during the vacation that an application was made to Lord Cottenham to sit at Lincoln's Inn in term time. His Lordship agreed to do so for two terms out of the four, and the change had worked so well that the present Lord Chancellor had acceded to a similar application, and the Court of Chancery now sat entirely at Lincoln's Inn. The gentlemen at the common law bar who resided in the Temple were exposed to great inconvenience in consequence of the distance of the Courts at Westminster and Guildhall. Now, the Court of Probate was in the centre of Doctors' Commons, amidst the offices of the advocates and proctors, and every facility was thus afforded for the transaction of business. It was not in law alone that the advantages he had alluded to were recognised. The underwriters of Lloyd's and the bankers of Lombard-street clustered round their respective centres of business. Now, supposing these Courts to be abolished, what substitute was to be provided for them? His hon. and learned Friend proposed to transfer them all to the Court of Chancery. But the transfer would be a transfer merely in name, for there was no accommodation in the immediate vicinity of the Court of Chancery. Under such circumstances, he asked why should the present state of things be disturbed? Now, with respect to the question of putting the proctors on half-pay. Such a proposition did not meet the justice of the case. Perhaps an old practitioner whose income was very large might be ready to retire on half-pay, but a man whose whole income was only just sufficient to live upon would find himself in a somewhat awkward position under such an arrangement. But to the junior members of the Court the Bill would afford no compensation at all, and great injury would be inflicted upon those clerks whose present position had cost them 800*l.* or 900*l.* And all this was to take place without any saving being effected to the public, because the stamp duties on probates were to be increased in order to provide what was called a compensation fund. Seeing that there was a great concurrence in the general principles of the Report he had referred to, he regretted that the Solicitor General had not taken a less extreme course. The hon. and learned Gentleman might have turned the Ecclesiastical Court into a temporal court, the judge to be appointed by the Crown instead of by the archbishop, and he might have made certain improvements with respect to which all would agree; but there was no excuse for the entire abolition of a system under which the business was well conducted, and at a moderate expense. It was a true saying, that if they gave a dog a bad name they might as well hang him, and so it was with the Ecclesiastical Courts. Certain persons took up a cry against them without knowing why, and Doctors' Commons was styled a terrible sink of iniquity. Well, then, his reply was, if a popular cry of that kind was to be taken as the measure of whether a thing was right or wrong, what would they say with respect to the Court of Chancery, improved and improving as he hoped it was? If a sink of iniquity was to be abolished, had they a better chance, in the public estimation, of finding a purer place by going to the Court of Chancery? It was said that the Lord Chancellor would make an order respecting the sitting of the Court. Now he (Mr. Malins) would venture to predict that if the Bill should pass in its present state, and the Court should continue to sit where it now sits, until an order to the contrary should be made by the Lord Chancellor, it would remain sitting there during the life of the last surviving practitioner in the Ecclesiastical Courts. He submitted to his hon. and learned Friend that it would have been far better if he had acted upon the recommendation of the Commissioners for removing the existing evils of the Court, and improving its practice. There was no more pretence for abolishing these courts than for abolishing the Court of Chancery. The Chancery system had been amended, and was working satisfactorily, and the system now under consideration ought to have been dealt with in a similar manner. Why, as he had just said, could not the Ecclesiastical Court have been converted into a Temporal Court, leaving the appointment of the Judge to the Crown, instead of the archbishop, and retaining the old practitioners, instead of throwing the Court open to the profession at large. Now, with regard to the common form business. As the law at present stood, when a will related to real estate, the question of the validity or invalidity of the will was submitted to a jury. Up to last year, when the will related to personal estate, even viva voce evidence could not be taken on the subject. The Commissioners recommended that the Court of Probate should have the power of submitting all wills to the decision of a jury. He perfectly concurred in that recommendation. He thought there could be no two opinions as to the desirability of probate being granted over the whole country, for it was most preposterous that a probate granted in York should not apply to Canterbury, and vice versa. It was this state of things, the pension of Mr. Moore, and other abuses of that sort, which had really brought these Ecclesiastical Courts into disrepute. What he wished to accomplish by his Motion was to induce his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General so far to modify his Bill, as to remove from it those portions which proposed to transfer the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts to the Court of Chancery. The petitions which he had that evening presented from a large body of the merchants, bankers, and traders of the City of London, headed by the Lord Mayor, and from 163 solicitors of the highest respectability practising in the Court of Chancery, against the Bill, showed that the change was not desired by the public or by the profession. Several of the eminent persons who had sat on the Commission had assured him personally that they were satisfied that this business could nowhere be better conducted than in Doctors' Commons, and that the transfer would be detrimental to the public. What justification, then, could his hon. and learned Friend have for bringing forward and persisting in this measure? Had the noble Lord at the head of the Government given the Bill his minute and deliberate consideration? for a heavy responsibility would rest on him if he allowed it to have the sanction of his position without a due examination of it. Had the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, under whose more particular cognisance these matters came, and who, having himself for some time practised in the Court of Chancery, might be presumed to understand the subject, given it his careful attention? In short, was this the Bill of the Lord Chancellor and the Solicitor General only, or had it been considered and sanctioned by the whole Cabinet? He appealed to his hon. and learned Friend to try the principle of amendment instead of that of abolition. Why not turn the Court from an Ecclesiastical into a Temporal Court, vest the appointment of the Judge in the Crown, and improve its mode of procedure instead of abolishing it altogether? If his hon. and learned Friend would consent so to modify his Bill, he could assure him that from that side of the House he would receive every assistance in passing it with all speed, and in making it as perfect and efficient a measure as possible.

MR. COLLIER said, he should support the second reading of the Bill not because he believed it the best possible measure, but a great improvement on the existing state of things. He should support it, because it was founded on the principle not of reforming, but of abolishing the Ecclesiastical Courts, these Gattons and Old Sarums of our judicial system. When his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General entered on the contest in which he is engaged with these courts, he did not seem aware of the extraordinary tenacity of life possessed by his foe. Twice, during two successive Sessions, did he enter the lists with Doctors' Commons, twice did Doctors' Commons apparently succumb to rise with renewed vigour, and this was the third assault of his hon. and learned Friend. The contest put him in mind of that of Evander with Herilus :—

(Horrendum dictu) dederat, terrena arma movenda
Ter leto sternendus erat."*

It would be indeed a proud day for his hon. Friend when he should be able to say,

*" Cui tamen omnes
Abstulit haec animas dextra et totidem exuit

Having no wish to defer that day, he should abstain from taking any course which might endanger the Bill, at the same time he took this opportunity of stating his views as to the best possible mode of dealing with the subject. He held that there was no necessity for any separate Court of Probate at all. He thought the business of probate could be performed by the existing tribunals without the creation of a new court, or a new Judge, or any additional expense to the country. He held that there was nothing in a will by which a man disposed of his property after his death which made it more difficult to be dealt with than an instrument by which he disposed of his property during his life. In no other country was there a separate court to deal with wills. In Scotland they were dealt with by the Sheriffs' Court and the Court of Session, and in America they were dealt with by the ordinary Courts and the County Courts; and even in this country, in former times, the County Courts had jurisdiction over wills until the jurisdiction was usurped by the Ecclesiastical Courts. The manifesto of the proctors pretended that the validity of a will was surrounded with so many technicalities and legal difficulties which none but a proctorial intellect could unravel them; but these legal difficulties were in reality no greater than those which arose with reference to deeds, leases, mercantile, and other contracts which were daily disposed of by the Courts of Law: nay, no greater than those sometimes disposed of at Quarter Sessions with reference to the settlement of a pauper. In his opinion no new or separate tribunal was called for, but the ordinary existing tribunals were sufficient. Let the County Courts be used for the purpose. Those courts were established for the local administration of justice ; their districts were marked out with reference to population, roads, railways, and other tests of public convenience. Why not use them for this as well as other branches of the administration of justice ? Let them have jurisdiction in all cases of Probate in the common form. Let the County Court be the place where the poor man might take his will for probate, and let the original be sent to the central registrar's office, and let copies be kept in the County Court. That was enough for all uncontested cases. With regard to the contested cases, when the property was small, and if it was under 500*l.*, it was not worth while to go into Chancery, or into any central court. When the amount was small, and a will was opposed, the question should be tried on the spot in the County Court ; and the estate be administered on the spot. At present, however, justice was denied to a poor man in contested cases. Where the property was small the member of the family who happened to occupy it kept possession : the rightful owner submitted to exclusion as a less evil than a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, and so things remained unless some active-minded attorney happened to interfere, which interference commonly resulted in the property being absorbed in costs, and the family fraternizing in prison. In his opinion, all these questions should be dealt with by the County Courts, and in that he did not differ from the hon. and learned Solicitor General, who said on a former occasion that he fully recognised the County Courts, and who, he believed, was not averse to this jurisdiction being conferred upon them. The next question was, what was to be done when the property in dispute was considerable. All such questions might be settled in the common law courts without the addition of another Judge. The courts of common law decided whether a man was sane or insane when real property was devised by will, nor would the country ever be satisfied unless such questions were tried by a jury. How did the law now stand ? A jury might decide that a man was sane with reference to the disposition of real property ; and the Ecclesiastical Courts might decide that he was insane with regard to his personal property. He would say, let questions of real and personal property under wills be decided by the same tribunals. Such were his views as to the best mode of dealing with this subject. The questions to be decided in the case of a disputed will were, the sanity of a testator, whether the will was forged, whether or not undue influence was exercised over him, and so forth, questions which ought to be tried by a jury whether they related to real or personal property: some other questions which occasionally arose more of law than of fact, such as what papers constituted the will? whether it was regularly attested? and so forth, might well be determined by the Common Law Judges, some of whom, as members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, were in the habit of deciding these very questions on appeal from the Ecclesiastical Courts. Holding these opinions, however, he knew that if he were to insist upon them, the effect might be to throw out this Bill; and he was unwilling to do so, for he regarded it as a vast improvement on the present system. If the principle of establishing a separate court were admitted, it seemed to him that the court now proposed by the hon. and learned Solicitor General was as good a court as could be devised. He intended, nevertheless, to propose in Committee some clauses, engrafting a jurisdiction of the County Courts upon the system set forth in this Bill; and he should also propose that, in all disputed cases, parties should have a right to claim trial by jury. He also should feel it his duty, probably to take the sense of the House upon some of the provisions relative to compensation. The proposed compensation to the executors seemed to him extravagant. If such claims of compensation were admitted, others would arise. The common-law bar had been deprived of a large income by the institution of the County Courts; and if a law were passed to simplify titles, conveyancing attorneys would be deprived of some of their profits; and were they also to be entitled to compensation? He (Mr. Collier) should support the Bill, subject to the modifications which he desired to introduce in it.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER said, he could not help expressing his surprise at the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier); for after having distinctly stated that he objected to every part of the Bill, he concluded by saying, as it was better than nothing, he should vote for the second reading, with a view of introducing some modifications of his own in Committee. Notwithstanding what had been said by the hon. and learned Member, he (Sir F.

Thesiger) asserted that, with the exception of some part of the criminal jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, which had of late years been gradually withdrawn, to the testamentary jurisdiction of these Courts there had never been made any well-grounded objection; and, so far from their having been subjected to general and universal censure, whenever a strong opinion had been expressed it had always been in favour of them. He was only anxious to have the best possible jurisdiction on this subject, as it was one of vital importance, and concerned the whole of the personal property of the kingdom. His feelings were very strong with respect to the course taken by the Solicitor General. They had, from 1832 to 1834, appointed Commissions for the purpose of deciding what it would be best to do with the jurisdiction of these Courts; and these Commissions had, with one solitary exception, reported in favour of their continuance. The hon. and learned Solicitor General was a Member of one of those Commissions, and he being in a minority of three to nine was perfectly aware that the Commissioners had recommended that the jurisdiction of these Courts should not be transferred to the Court of Chancery. The Commissioners said, that in their opinion, the interests of the public would not be consulted by a transfer of the uncontested testamentary jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery, and that such a transfer would be attended with all the inconveniences, without any of the advantages, incident to the constitution of a distinct court. The conclusion, therefore, at which they arrived was, that the testamentary jurisdiction ought not to be transferred to the Court of Chancery. What was the use of appointing Commissions to report their opinions upon important subjects, if, without any reason being assigned for such a course, measures were afterwards introduced utterly at variance with those opinions? Notwithstanding this Report, his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General proposed to create a fourth Vice Chancellor, to give him the powers possessed by the other Equity Judges to apply to his Court all the orders and regulations applicable to the Court of Chancery, and to allow an appeal from his decision to the Lord Chancellor—a proposition which was an entire violation both of the spirit and of the letter of the Report of the Commissioners. If the Ecclesiastical Courts had been so universally condemned as was asserted by their opponents, there must be some strong principle of vitality in them, or they could not have lived so long. Their existence had been threatened as long ago as 1841, and a humourist of the day had on that occasion drawn up a will for Doctors' Commons, of which he would read a small portion to the House, because he thought his hon. and learned Friend must have taken it as the model of the present Bill. It was to this effect:—

"I, Doctors' Commons, in the parish of St. Benedict, Paul's-wharf, London, being very aged, and finding by general computation that my time draws to an end, and being much shaken, both in body and mind, with a Westminsterague, yet of perfect mind and memory, to avoid all suits and controversies that hereafter may arise concerning my estate or any part or parcel thereof and to the intent and purpose that my contentious days may be consummated and ended in peace, do constitute, &c., this my last will and testament. For my personal estate (having never been possessed of any lands) I willingly bequeath my reverend judges, vicars-generals, chancellors, commissioners, archdeacons, deans and chapters, and their surrogates, and also all high commissioners, judges, delegates, and legum doctores quoscumque to the High Court of Parliament, there to be cherished according to their merits and deservings. Then I bequeath all my registrars, deputy-registrars, proctors, examiners, and public notaries to the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, to be admitted attorneys (if no prohibition be posted to the contrary). He then bequeathed his incontinent articles to Bloomsbury, Long acre, and other like places of good-fellowship; his libels of defamation to prudential seolds; his decrees to the Court of Chancery, in case they wanted any; and all the rest of his writings, rescripts, manuscripts, and superfluous papers whatsoever, to cooks, bakers, grocers, and chandlers."

He believed he had accidentally brought to light the source from whence his hon. and learned Friend had derived his Bill. The testamentary jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts consisted of two perfectly distinct parts—the common form business and the contentious business—and there was not the slightest ground for an imputation upon the manner in which either portion of that jurisdiction was exercised. There was no foundation for maintaining that that Court was so bad and corrupt as to be incapable of reformation, and must consequently be utterly abolished. The duties of proctors in transacting the common form business were of immense importance, no less than 18,000 wills having been admitted to probate last year, involving property to the amount, he believed, of more than 50,000,000l., and he would state what was the opinion of the Commissioners with regard to the proposed abolition of that body. They said the evidence they had taken had fully satisfied their minds that this business had been carefully and efficiently transacted by the proctors, and they thought that to throw it open to attorneys and solicitors would be attended with no advantage, but on the contrary, with considerable detriment to the public. The most eminent attorneys, whose interest it would be to obtain a share of the business, had expressed a similar opinion, and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) had presented a petition from the principle firms in London in favour of the continuance of the present system. If attorneys were admitted indiscriminately, the persons who would have to prove the wills would be the very persons who had made them, whereas it was part of the duty of proctors, who were not only agents of the parties, but also recognised officers of the Court, to point out to the Court any objections that might be raised to the wills before they were admitted to probate. If the Attorney were admitted to prove the will no such objection could be made. But it was proposed to admit 10,000 persons to deal with personal property to an enormous amount, and, although the attorneys were a highly honourable body of men, yet in so large a body there must be men of a different character; and let the House see the opportunity for fraud which would be furnished. An attorney had only to prove the will; he could then go to the bank and draw the money and get possession of all the funds. By this rash and dangerous experiment the Solicitor General proposed to trust to unknown hands, and to many who were possibly likely to abuse it, the duties which had been faithfully performed by the proctors. With regard to contentious jurisdiction, there were strong reasons for alleging that nothing could be more satisfactorily conducted than the business of the Court under the present system. The Judges of those Courts had been men of the highest intelligence and character, and whose judgments were studies for legal minds. What complaints were ever heard of the judgments of the Judges of the Ecclesiastical Courts on testamentary matters? Some of the counsel practising in these Courts were among the most learned and deeply read members of the profession, and at the present moment that learning was of the greatest importance, because connected as the Admiralty Court had been with the Ecclesiastical Court, great advantages had arisen from the intimate acquaintance with international law possessed by the bar of these Courts. But his hon. and learned Friend proposed by his Bill utterly to destroy that advantage of having a skilled body of men qualified to discuss questions of such vital importance. He would beg to call the attention of the House to a passage in the Report of 1832. The Commissioners and Chief Justice Tindal in that report agreed in declaring that the connection between the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts had been most useful, and that it was most desirable that the civil law should be well understood, especially in time of war. He had heard in the course of the debate the odious word "monopolists" applied to the profession practising at Doctors' Commons; but he would remind the House that the Common Law bar and the Chancery bar were practically divided, and that to the great advantage of the public and the credit of the profession. What reason had his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for coming forward with such a measure? Had it been called for by the public or recommended by any authority on which the House could rely? Why did his hon. and learned Friend depart from the recommendations of the Commissioners, who had given their attention to the subject? He regarded the present measure as a rash and untried experiment, for which the country would have to pay a most enormous price in the way of compensation. They had a Judge presiding with great credit in a Court of testamentary jurisdiction, and yet his hon. and learned Friend had resolved that he should not remain there, although he was to continue to receive his entire salary as compensation for his removal from office. Compensation was also to be given to proctors and other persons, and they were called upon to pay this sum for an experiment which they had no reason to think would be satisfactory; even where the Court was to sit was to be matter for future consideration; and he would submit that when they were called upon to abolish the present Court, they should receive information that would enable them to adopt a safe course in making a change in the present system. The safe course, in his opinion, would be to adhere to the old foundation. It was true that it was not adapted in some respects to the present time, but instead of abolishing it they should attach to the present foundation the changes which the process of time had rendered necessary. He and those who acted with him had no desire to continue the local jurisdictions that had been condemned. The Ecclesiastical Court was a name which it was not desirable to retain, but let the Perogative Court and the Arches Court be blended in one Court, to be called according to the recommendation of a high authority, the Queen's Court of Probate. Then the Court would be built upon such a foundation as would adapt itself to the circumstances of the times. The whole of the machinery was already in existence for such a court, and it would give more satisfaction than the Court of Chancery. Anything more unsatisfactory, anything more extravagantly expensive than the course of examination in the Court of Chancery was hardly possible to be imagined. Yet, when this testamentary jurisdiction should be transferred to that Court, then immediately all the rules, orders, and practices of that Court were to be applied to it, and among the rest, the very cumbersome and expensive mode of taking evidence. With regard to written evidence, his belief was, that in a great number of cases where the evidence was of a complicated and conflicting character, the Judge would be better able to consider and contrast the evidence when written than when given viva voce, though in some instances it might be advantageous to have a viva voce examination. There could be no difficulty in having a jury in the Probate Court. It was in vain that his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Collier), who objected to every clause in the Bill, was willing to allow it to go into Committee, in the hope that the jurisdiction would be transferred to the County Courts. Let not the House deceive itself by any such notion. They were there to decide upon the principle of the Bill. Were they prepared to abandon what had been so long established? Would they sweep away the Ecclesiastical Courts which, with regard to testamentary jurisdiction, were as free from reproach as any court in the kingdom? Would they introduce, for the sake of experiment and trial, a new jurisdiction utterly disregarding the opinion of those Commissioners to whom they had intrusted this important question, and who had stated that all the existing machinery ought to be continued, and who had declared it to be their opinion that the present Ecclesiastical Courts might be reformed and adapted to the requirements of existing circumstances; or would they, contrary to the advice of those Commissioners, adopt the principle of the Solicitor General, one of the small minority of those Commissioners, and abolish those courts which had so long stood, not only for the advantage of themselves, but for the benefit of the public at large?

MR. ROUNDELL PALMER said, he intended to vote for the second reading of the Bill, but certainly not because he was in any degree disposed to disparage the opinion of the majority of the Commissioners of 1832. With regard to the proctors, he admitted that they had ably discharged their duties, but it did not at all follow that because the gentlemen whose duty it was to administer an existing system had done it with advantage to the public, that, therefore, the system itself was one which ought to be supported. The question really was, whether this was a proper subject for law reform; and, if so, whether the reform proposed was one deserving the approval of the House of Commons? There had been an opinion long existing in the country that this was a proper subject for reform; and he thought that very good reasons had been assigned, for the opinion that the present testamentary jurisdiction was altogether in a state unworthy of those improvements which had taken place in other branches of the law. It was absurd to suppose that they could deal with this subject upon the notion that the existing system was a good system and was working well and satisfactorily in the country. The fact was, that they must recast the whole system, and the question that naturally arose was, how it was to be done? One great evil which would be remedied by the principle of the Bill was that division of jurisdiction that at present existed in a matter which was unity in itself, and which required to be consolidated. Why should it be necessary, in the nature of things, that you should have one court to decide what constituted a will and another court to construe the purport of that will? There was no ground whatever for such a distinction in principle. It appeared to him to be absurd to say that the Court of Chancery, after having determined how an estate should be distributed, should have no power of determining the instruments for its distribution. In cases of wills made by married women under special powers, and of instruments which were sometimes executed to avoid some Statute, such as wills made in the form of a deed to avoid the law relating to legacy or mortmain, the present system appeared to him to require alteration, for even in cases of bequests fraudulently obtained, the Ecclesiastical Courts could not deal with the subject beyond the question of testamentary intention. The subject of real estate was only dealt with to a partial extent by the present Bill, but yet the way in which it was dealt with was a great step towards a consolidation of the whole subject of testamentary jurisdiction. The present system gave rise to great absurdities; for instance, in a case of litigation with regard to the validity of a will, first, there was a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, then at the same time a Bill was filed in Chancery to manage the estate and take possession, and then there was another suit about the real estate sent to be tried by law upon an issue directed by the Court of Chancery. Such a state of things was a disgrace to the jurisprudence of the country, and he should support the second reading of the present Bill because he thought that it tended to establish the consolidation of all testamentary jurisdiction. The Bill appeared to him to be a much nearer approach to the recommendations of the Commissioners and to that which hon. Members opposite appeared to him to wish for than any one would imagine who had heard the strong language which had been applied to it in the course of the discussion. In all points but one it did, or enabled to be done, what the Commissioners recommended; and as to common form business, it appeared to him to give the power of adopting all that was useful in the present system, the working of which was so much praised by hon. Members opposite. Perhaps it might be said that his reason for taking the course he proposed to adopt was that he was a Chancery lawyer, but he thought himself entitled to take that course when he considered how much of the business of the Court of Chancery referred to testamentary matters, and that, in fact, that Court had for centuries exercised the entire administration of property under wills. If consolidation was aimed at, therefore, he thought this testamentary business must be transferred to the Court of Chancery. As to the question raised about proctors and attorneys, he did not believe there was any weight in the argument that there would be greater liability to frauds in the concoction of wills under the new than under the old system, for the attorney had now just as great opportunity for malpractices as he would have then. But that assurance which the commendation of Sir Charles Barry, to connect the public offices with the Houses of Parliament?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, a plan had been submitted to his consideration by Sir Charles Barry for building public offices in the neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament, and he had laid that proposal before the Treasury, but the object of this Bill was chiefly to provide for the rebuilding of the public offices in Downing Street, which were at present in a most dilapidated condition. The Foreign-office and the Colonial-office, especially, were in such a state of dilapidation that they required to be propped up on all sides. They were also in a very unhealthy condition. Indeed, they were perfect nuisances, and any change must be for the better.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON hoped, when such a necessity existed for providing public offices, that the vacant space near Downing Street, which had remained unoccupied for so many years, would be rendered available.

DISCIPLINE OF THE ARMY.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he had a question to put to his noble and gallant Friend the Commander in Chief relative to certain occurrences which were stated by the newspapers to have taken place in the army. Their Lordships no doubt remembered the case of Lieutenant Perry, and he was sure they would be sorry to find that the practices which were then so justly reprehended were still continued. There appeared in the London journals of Wednesday a statement, copied from the provincial papers, giving an account of what was alleged to have occurred in the barracks of Canterbury. He knew nothing whatever of this matter except from what he had read in the journals. There were two cases mentioned. One was between Ensigns Sanders and Neville, of the 30th Regiment, and Ensign Falkner, of the same regiment. In that case his noble and gallant Friend had given judgment, and therefore he would not detain the House by any remark upon it, except to say that he did not think that his noble and gallant Friend had erred on the side of severity. It was impossible to read the paper of instructions to officers on joining their regiments or dépôts without being struck with the good sense and propriety which characterised them, and there could be no question that the discipline and conduct of the army would be well maintained if the young men and their commanding officers acted up to the instructions therein contained. He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) did not pretend to understand the discipline of the army, but he must say that the persons who appeared to him to be principally in fault in these cases were the commanding officers. He could not think that such a state of things as had been revealed in these instances could exist if the commanding officers did their duty as gentlemen and Christians, with these instructions for their guide. The other case, to which he now wished more particularly to refer, occurred at Canterbury. It appeared that Cornet Baumgarten entered his regiment, the Enniskillens, and was for a long time subjected to the most disgusting, insulting, and provoking tricks. He was in consequence betrayed into the great folly of sending a challenge to one of his tormentors. This step was of course contrary to the civil law of the land, and directly against the articles of war. It appeared that a sergeant of the regiment, who understood his duty both as a civilian and a soldier better than those in command, Sergeant Brodie, interfered to prevent this breach of the peace. And who did their Lordships think was the person who opposed him, and insisted on the duel going on? Their Lordships would scarcely believe that it was the adjutant of the regiment. He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) was stating the facts as represented by the sergeant. Well, he who, if he did his duty, should show a good example to the regiment, the superior officer, was the man who interfered to prevent the laudable attempt of the sergeant. He wished most sincerely that it was possible to make the sergeant and the adjutant change places; for the one had outstepped all bounds of reason and discipline, while the other had shown himself a good citizen and a good soldier. This adjutant who should have been the first to prevent a duel, actually cal Courts had been uniformly rejected. And he could not help feeling that this Bill appeared very likely to meet the fate of its predecessors; for, although he was inclined to vote for its second reading, he could not deny that it was open to serious objections, for there were many evils that would result from its adoption. The one which pressed most upon him was as to the manner in which it would affect the poor people. The greater number of wills brought in for probate related to sums under 100*l.*, and the proof of wills, could not, like other legal matters, be avoided. Now, he felt that this measure must necessarily increase the cost and difficulty of proving wills, by compelling all wills to be proved at a central office. They were now proved by the Registrar in the nearest county town, without the intervention of an attorney or a proctor, at a cost of 2*l.* or 3*l.* But if this Bill were passed the will must pass through the hands of a country solicitor and his town agent. There would be fees to both, and probably a correspondence between them, which would, of course, accumulate costs, besides the fees of the court itself. Then there was another thing. The rules of the new court must be very stringent in order to prevent causes of fraud occurring. But if so there must be numerous checks entailing heavy expense, and preventing any person passing his will without professional assistance. Now, the necessity of these forms was now dispensed with, since the person coming to prove a will was in all probability known to the Registrar, and was not, therefore, likely to attempt to practise a fraud upon him. Besides, there could be no doubt that there must be a very large staff of officers in the new court to perform the duties now discharged by the proctors, and if so, of course the fees for their payment must necessarily be heavy. He would not at this time allude to the necessarily large amount that would be required for compensation. He thought they had not yet considered fairly what were the wants of the people of the country on this subject. The first great evil in connection with these courts was one which was rather a matter of feeling. There ought to be nothing of an ecclesiastical character about courts having jurisdiction of a testamentary character. The Judges ought to be appointed by the Queen, and all connection between them and the ecclesiastical organisation and the ecclesiastical divisions of the country cease. If this evil were removed, and some defects in the method of procedure were removed, he believed there would be no difficulty in establishing district courts which would give general satisfaction, and would attain the objects sought for both inexpensively and efficiently. Under the present Bill they were about, at an enormous expense to the country, to establish what he would call a non-effective establishment; and he for one should cordially give his vote against the measure.

PUBLIC OFFICES—DOWNING STREET EXTENSION BILL.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH moved for leave to bring in a Bill to enable the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works to provide additional offices for the public service, in or near Downing Street. The object of the Bill was to provide for the rebuilding of the Government offices in Downing Street, which were at present in a very dilapidated condition.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it was desirable that some plans or report should be laid before the House, which would afford them information as to the alterations contemplated by the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH said, that the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee, before whom a general plan of the intended alterations and an estimate of their expense would be laid. The Bill would then come down again to the House, and hon. Members would have an opportunity of considering the plans and the report of the Committee.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he wished to know whether the expenditure for the proposed buildings would render any local taxation necessary?

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH, in reply, said, that the offices to which the Bill referred were required for the service of the Government, and the sum necessary for their erection must, therefore, be provided by Parliament.

In reply to MR. HADFIELD,

MR. WILSON said, that the agreement for a renewal of the lease of the house occupied by the Duke of Buccleugh had been entered into by the Government of Lord Derby, and was confirmed by the Government of Lord Aberdeen.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he begged to inquire whether any measures had been taken, in conformity with a re-

those hon. Gentlemen who were opposed to the maintenance of church-rates as part of the law of the land appeared to forget that, by a recent decision—no doubt alluding to the recent decision in the Braintree case—there was no power to enforce that law. He (the Bishop of Exeter) was prepared to prove that that decision left the law respecting church-rates exactly as it found it, and that it only stated that the particular mode adopted in that case of giving effect to the law was wrong, and that the churchwardens were entirely under a misapprehension as to the course it was their duty to pursue. He had ventured, a few days ago, to appeal to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, whether that was not the condition in which that decision left the law, and that noble and learned Lord said it was. The noble and learned Lord, however, did not stop there, but, giving the great weight of his official position to his opinion, he stated that the law respecting church-rates was absolutely effete, that there was no power of enforcing them, and that they must be content to look upon church-rates as a bygone institution. The noble and learned Lord had remarked that—

"The Right rev. Prelate was quite correct, and, no doubt, it was still the duty of the vestries to keep the churches in repair, and supply the articles necessary for Divine service; but the difficulty was as to the means of enforcing the duty. In ancient times it was excommunication or interdict; but the very mention of these would be considered trifling, as they had been disused since the Reformation; and although it was one of the matters referred to Archibishop Cranmer, at that era to provide a substitute for the ancient remedy of excommunication, it was not done. Notwithstanding, therefore, that old legal maxim, 'qui jus est remedium', there really was no remedium for the enforcement of the duty of the vestry to raise a rate for the repair of a church. A rate made by a minority at the vestry was held invalid by the House of Lords. When, therefore, it was said that it was the duty of the vestry to make a rate when necessary, it must be borne in mind that, practically, there was no means of enforcing the duty; still, however, it remained."—[See 3 Hansard, p. 1300].

Now, he (the Bishop of Exeter) thought his noble and learned Friend had not given due consideration to the matter when he uttered that opinion; for it was plain that those persons who were opposed to the exercise of the right of levying a rate for churches considered the existing state of the law to be a very serious one, and Mr. Courtauld, in his evidence, made the following statement—

"I do not mean to say that in the present state of the law it is not competent for a church-rate to be enforced, even in such a parish as Braintree, where the dissentients are a large majority, because I have always felt thoroughly satisfied that there was a power in the ecclesiastical tribunals to punish by unlimited imprisonment—that is to say, by imprisonment until reparation and submission—all parties who, being called upon to join in making a church-rate, refused to attend a vestry meeting, and so to join in it; and we, in Braintree, are seriously apprehensive that such a power will be resorted to. That apprehension rests, in the first place, upon certain very significant passages in the judgment of Mr. Baron Parke."

After that evidence could it be said that the law was a dead letter; and that if it were put in motion it would not prove effectual? In the Exchequer Chamber in Hilary Term, 1850, Mr. Baron Reade (the noble and learned Lord now on the woolsack), in the case of "Gosling v. Veley," maintained this doctrine, that under the existing law all parties in the parish might be punished indiscriminately for contumacy in neglecting to make a rate, and that the palliation of a doctrine apparently so unjust was, that the churchwardens should take care that the punishment should fall on the obstinate parishioners only. If excommunication, however, were the punishment to be inflicted, he could not see how a distinction was to be made, for excommunication could not pass against a whole body but an individual, and therefore would pass against every individual of the whole body. Having shown that the parties were subject to excommunication for the non-repair of the church, his next step would be to show that the parties were subject to imprisonment. Chief Justice Tindal, in delivering judgment for himself and seven other Judges, of whom the noble and learned Lord was one, in the case of "Binder v. Veley," said, the repair of the fabric of the church was a duty which the parishioners were compellable to perform, and not one which they might either voluntarily perform, or decline to perform, at their own discretion; but the law was imperative in directing the performance of this work as a compellable duty; when therefore the parishioners assembled in vestry they did not assemble to determine whether they ought to repair the church and maintain the service, for as to that they were concluded by the law, but how the work might most effectually and most conveniently be done. The judgment stated further that the parishioners could no more cast from them the burden of repairing the church than they could that of maintaining highways and bridges, and also that it left wholly untouched the power which the spiritual court possessed of enforcing church-rates. The learned Chief Justice also said that the spiritual court was empowered to compel the churchwardens to repair the church by spiritual censure, and might punish those parishioners who refused to perform their duty by excommunication; that was (said the learned Judge) since the statute of the 53d of George III., chap. 26, by imprisonment. This power still remained, and the spiritual court could now enforce, by imprisonment, the repairing of the church. But that this was considered to be the case by the Legislature appeared from an Act passed so recently as the statute of the 2nd and 3rd William IV., chap. 93, by which after reciting the inconveniences that had arisen from the process of the Ecclesiastical Courts being inoperative out of the limits of their respective jurisdictions, it was enacted, that any person who, having the privilege of peerage or of Parliament, or others, was ordered by lawful decree of any ecclesiastical court to pay any sum of money, and should not on non-compliance pay the same, on certification thereof, sequestration might issue out of Chancery against the real and personal estate of such person. [Lord CAMPBELL: that refers to the non-payment of the rates, and not the making of them.] He was speaking altogether as to the effect of the law on church-rates, both as to the making of them and as to the non-payment of them. He therefore said that the Legislature, even in their own time, had given to a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court enforcing church-rates what was equivalent to an execution at common law and a judgment, and over and above all this sequestration of their lands but of Chancery. Instead, therefore, of the remedy for default in payment being less stringent, church-rates had this advantage over tithes or rates for highways and bridges; that church-rates could be enforced by sequestration; and he was consequently at a loss to understand upon what ground it could be contended that the present law was a dead letter. The noble and learned Lord on the woolsack need not feel annoyed at having overlooked this Act. This position reminded him of an incident in the life of Lord Chancellor Thurlow. Lord Thurlow was once called to account for having stated something to be law which was not. Lord Thurlow, in language which their Lordships could not expect him to repeat, reiterated that his decision was correct, and thereupon the objector shewed him an act of Parliament. What was Lord Thurlow's reply? Why, that he should have felt ashamed of himself if he had been ignorant of the law of the land; but with regard to Acts of Parliament, he never pretended to know them, and he believed there was no one that did. He was aware that there had been long a desire to put church-rates on a different footing from any other charges on land. Lord Stanley stated that church-rates and tithes were quite distinct. There was one distinction between church-rates and tithes which certainly did exist, and was a distinction in favour of church-rates. For tithes they did not go to the land for the remedy, but they sued the party for subtracting the tithes. In the same way for highways; they did not go to the land for the remedy, but proceeded by indictment against the person. But in the case of church-rates they could not only go to the land, but to the person. The evidence given before the other House by an eminent lawyer, Dr. Lushington, was very remarkable. He did not know whether it was attributable to any connexion with the Radical constituency which that learned Gentleman had so long represented; but it was marvellous to see an ecclesiastical Judge having a strong bias against church-rates. Dr. Lushington being asked by the Committee if church-rates were at any time regarded as a poll-tax, said they were certainly of that nature. He never was more surprised than when he read that opinion, because church-rates were essentially contradictory to a poll-tax—a poll-tax being an equal tax on all persons; and church-rates being a tax according to property. If anything could surprise him more than the statement, it was the reason given by the learned Gentleman for it—that it was obvious they were of the nature of a poll-tax, because, whenever there had been a charge upon land, as in the case of tithes, there had always been power of distress and seizing the lands. He had no hesitation in saying; that there was not; and never had been, that power in the case of tithes, and if he were wrong in expressing that opinion he hoped he should be corrected; but that being so, church-rates possessed an advantage over all other charges upon the person in respect of land, inasmuch as they were charges upon the land also. It appeared, therefore, that there was a remedy in the case of church-rates, that the remedy was imprisonment; that there was no legal difficulty in having recourse to it, and that it was totally without foundation to say, that the law of church-rates could not be enforced. Those who advocated an alteration of the law urged as a reason, that such was the disposition of the people that it was impossible to carry it into effect. In that House, the very sanctuary of justice, they ought not to be told that justice was not to be performed because it was unpopular in any quarter. The extent of that popularity was, however, greatly exaggerated. A right rev. Friend, after careful investigation, found that 4 per cent of the whole parishes in the kingdom was the whole extent of the resistance to church-rates. Then it was said, the number of cases did not show the amount of agitation. That might be very true; but if the Legislature attended to agitation, he believed they could not stop with the abolition of church-rates, they would have to go much further and to abolish—he would not say higher institutions, for he did not believe there could be higher than the Church—but institutions in a worldly point of view more important. And in what had this anti-church-rate agitation originated? He did not scruple to say, that this agitation had originated, not in a real popular movement but in a conspiracy, and that the conspiracy was recorded unblushingly in the evidence of Mr. Courtauld, who said,

"It had been previously determined as a very available mode of practically opposing a rate, that a Dissenter (and I was to have been the individual) should be the churchwarden."

He did not recognize Mr. Courtauld as a Dissenter; Mr. Courtauld was something more than a Dissenter, being a Unitarian; and he protested against his calling himself a Dissenter. He put it to their Lordships whether a number of persons combining for the purpose of preventing not merely a lawful act, but what it was the duty of the parties to do, was not a conspiracy?—whether, in law, it did not amount to a very grave misdemeanour, for which the parties, if prosecuted, would be liable to very heavy punishment? But he had not done full justice to the origin of his agitation in merely terming it a conspiracy—it was a conspiracy carried on by premeditated wilful perjury and subornation of perjury. He said that, because Mr. Courtauld was elected churchwarden in order to prevent the performance of the proper duties of the office. The duty of a churchwarden was stated upon high authority, that of Dr. Lushington in his evidence before the Committee, as follows:—

"The proper duty of a churchwarden is, as soon as ever he comes into office, to see what is requisite and necessary for the sustentation of the church, that is, the repair of the fabric, and the finding of things requisite for the decent performance of Divine Service; those are, strictly speaking, the expenses that ought to fall upon the church-rate. It is his duty to make an estimate in the first instance; to call a vestry immediately; to lay before the vestry that estimate, and to ask from them a rate; if they refuse him the rate, he has done his duty."

He wrote to the learned Judge who gave this opinion (Dr. Lushington), asking him whether there was not here an important omission—whether it was not the further duty of the churchwarden to present to the ordinary "the want of repair, that he had caused an estimate to be laid before the vestry, and that a rate had been refused." The learned Judge answered him, that "Such was the further duty of the churchwarden, and he authorised him to state that such was his judgment." The churchwarden's solemn declaration, in lieu of oath, was as follows—

"That I will well and truly perform the office of churchwarden within the parish of —, for the ensuing year, to the best of my skill and ability; and that I will present all such persons and things as by the laws ecclesiastical of this realm are presentable."

Their Lordships would now be enabled to judge of the morality of the gentlemen who conspired to procure Dissenters to be elected churchwardens, with a view to defeat the raising of church-rates, which it was their duty to cause to be raised, and of which duty they were once solemnly sworn and now were solemnly "affirmed" to the performance. An indictment for perjury would not lie for the breach of a promise attested by oath; but it was morally perjury, and so in the case of a promise by way of solemn affirmation—which, by statute, was substituted for oath—to discharge a duty, such affirmation being made with the deliberate object of preventing it from being performed. Morally such conduct was justly accusable of perjury, and subornation of perjury and conspiracy to commit such crimes and violate the law. Yet the wealthy person who had set on foot this odious conspiracy had not scrupled to profess before the Committee scruples of "conscience," forsooth, as to payment of church-rates. This reminded one irresistibly of "straining at a gnat and swallow-

ing a camel." But when they came to be examined into, these "conscientious scruples" turned out to be extremely curious. It appeared that Mr. Courtauld, although he refused to be rated either in the parish of Bocking or Braintree, in each of which he had property, yet in the neighbouring parish of Gosfield he was rated and paid the rate. Mr. Courtauld was asked this question by the Committee—" You have stated that you have yourself individually, and those with whom you act, unconquerable objections in point of conscience to the payment of church-rates imposed upon the parish of Braintree ? " Mr. Courtauld replied, " I have." Whereon one of the Committee naturally asked how he could consistently and conscientiously pay a church-rate in the parish of Gosfield, whilst he refused to pay them in the parishes of Bocking and Braintree ? The answer was remarkable, and he could well understand the curiosity evinced by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst), but he would defy his noble and learned Friend to guess what it was. Mr. Courtauld replied, " In the parish of Gosfield I have been permitted to construct a family vault and erect—[What?]—a family mausoleum." So that the gentleman who agitated against church-rates in one parish was a hyper-churchman in another, where he had aspired to the distinction of a family mausoleum. This was the right royal style ! Few of their Lordships had mausoleums. " Mausoleum" was an Asiatic term of dignity and splendour, and here was the arch-agitator of Bocking and Braintree desirous of becoming the satrap of Gosfield. But when a magnificent estate, lent by an ancestor of the Duke of Buckingham to Louis XVIII., when an exile in this country, came into the possession of a wealthy person, ambitious of a " mausoleum," although the originator of the agitation against church-rates, it was very remarkable that he should select for its site the church or churchyard, and place it under the protection of church-rates. Mr. Courtauld added—" I am, consequently, in the habit of resorting to the parish church of Gosfield"—not on Sundays; let him not be suspected of anything so wrong, but—" on the death of any member of our family, and am thereby a partaker of the advantages resulting from the church of Gosfield." He wished Mr. Courtauld had had more consideration for the poor of those parishes in which he had acquired the enormous wealth that permitted him to extend his possessions into Gosfield, and to indulge his aspirations for a mausoleum. Would it not have been more decent if this wealthy person had taken some slight care that the hundreds of poor people, members of the Church of England, should have had the means of worshipping God in their own parish church ? All that this wealthy agitator, however, cared for, it appeared, so far as parish churches were concerned, was that he should have a " mausoleum" in one of them, and the opportunity of interring therein any of the members of his distinguished family. Mr. Courtauld added—

" I should, however, explain that I, individually, do not partake of what is called the conscientious objection which is taken by many of my brother Dissenters."

He again, in the name of the Dissenters, objected to Mr. Courtauld calling himself a Dissenter. Mr. Courtauld also said that the question of the church-rate struggle, taken per se, was gone comparatively into insignificance, but was interesting to Dissenters, as bearing upon the important question of the separation of Church and State. This statement startled the Committee—one of whom said, " that is a large question, will you explain what you mean by separation of Church and State ? " To which the witness answered, " I do not know how I can explain it better than by the words themselves—' separation of Church and State.' " The witness was a person of shrewdness. The words were significant enough, and amply described what the authors of this anti-church-rate agitation aimed at. It was well for their Lordships, then, to bear in mind that the concealed and ultimate object of any legislation for the abolition of church-rates was the separation of Church and State. If it was asked whether the present state of things was desirable, he (the Bishop of Exeter) answered that he deplored, regretted, and deprecated it; but he deplored it most deeply on account of the unscrupulous means by which the agitation was carried on, and the weak concessions made to it; so that there was no security that, ere long, their Lordships' House might not be polluted by the proposition of some measure for the abolition of church-rates—that is, for the separation of Church and State, which was the real and ultimate object of the promoters of such a measure. He would gladly see some measure by which the interests of religion might be secured with less opening for the dissension and acrimony which the present system tended to produce. But that it was not easy to devise such a system was shown by the successive failures of all that had been proposed; and he believed that no system could be projected less liable to evil than that which now existed. He had no special love for church-rates, but he agreed with the First Lord of the Treasury, who had said—

"If the law were that a compulsory power existed; requiring every parish to levy a rate, then that would be the best mode of providing for the fabric of the church."

Assuming—what he could not but assume—that some compulsory system was necessary, he did not believe that any better system than the present one could be invented. With regard to the voluntary system, he admitted that in many populous parishes, particularly in great cities, the church people might themselves do what was necessary for the keeping the churches in repair, and the country ought to be grateful to them for so doing; but he must caution them that all such voluntary measures had a fearful tendency to rob the poor of their rights and privileges. The Peers of England never would desert the poor of England; and, whatever measures they adopted, they must remember that the poor man has as good a right to a seat in church as the highest, the richest, and the proudest had to his rank, wealth, and station. The danger of voluntary measures was that those who contributed money would claim peculiar rights with regard to pews and sittings, and he was sorry that he was able to illustrate that danger by referring to the state of things in the city in which their Lordships were assembled. The parish of St. James, Westminster, contained a population of 36,400, of whom 20,000 were poor. The parish church contained 1,300 sittings let and appropriated, while there were only 400 free sittings for adults—which not more than 200 were tolerably good—and 100 for children. In St. James's Chapel, York Street, there were 550 sittings let and appropriated, and not a single free sitting had been provided. St. Phillip's Chapel, Regent Street, contained 850 sittings let and appropriated, while the number of free sittings for adults was only fifty, and for children forty. In this chapel there were also 376 sittings in the roof, but they were out of sight and never occupied. He now came to a case of a better description—that of Archbishop Tenison's Chapel, in

Regent Street, in which there were 550 sittings let and appropriated; and 400 free sittings for adults and seventy for children, all of which sittings were excellent. Then, again, in St. Luke's Church, Berwick Street, there were 400 sittings let and appropriated, and 280 free sittings for adults, of which 240 were good, and 600 for children. The population of these parishes amounted to 36,400, and their Lordships would perceive how inadequate the church accommodation was; but such results, he believed, they must expect from the voluntary system in towns. They had been told that one-fourth of the parishes in the country resisted church-rates; but, even if they left things as they at present were, he entreated their Lordships not to be induced, by apprehensions of dangers which it was said would arise if agitation on this question were allowed to spread; to desist from earnestly and strenuously resisting any attempt which might be made for the abolition of church-rates.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR felt it necessary to make some remarks, although it was a great disadvantage to have to follow the right rev. Prelate in debate, because the House, whether they concurred with the right rev. Prelate or not, always found him very entertaining. On the present occasion, too, the right rev. Prelate had very greatly amused their Lordships; but in the latter part of his speech, he had entirely lost sight of the subject of the petitions he had presented and of the subject he had brought before the House; for however much it might be lamented that, in the large London parishes, where the churches were originally built for a population of one or two thousand, the accommodation was inadequate for either rich or poor, when it was multiplied to 30,000 or 40,000, it was not, surely, any fault of the church-rates that such deficiencies existed. No law had ever recognised the obligation of levying church-rates to build new churches as population advanced;—that had been done under special Acts of Parliament, from time to time passed; and if the Church Building Acts did not make adequate provision, that was quite a different question. The right rev. Prelate had, in a very entertaining way, described to their Lordships the aspiring ambition of what he called the House of Courtould, and had amused their Lordships with his remarks upon the evidence of a gentleman of that name; but really, whether Mr. Courtould was, or not, a Dissenter, as he described himself to be; that, with other private and personal matters, to which the right rev. Prelate had referred, were matters with which their Lordships had no concern at all. But to the former part of the address, he (the Lord Chancellor) felt himself bound to make some observations, inasmuch as the right rev. Prelate had intimated that he (the Lord Chancellor) had, not intentionally, but through ignorance, misled their Lordships on a former occasion, and inadequately represented the state of the law as regards church-rates. Now he (the Lord Chancellor) would not shelter himself behind the example of Lord Thurlow, who replied to a similar remark (although in language far less courtly than that of the right rev. Prelate), "I don't consider myself bound to know all Acts of Parliament." He (the Lord Chancellor) admitted that if he had ever, unintentionally and in ignorance, misled their Lordships, he should ask their forgiveness, but he would say now exactly what he said the other night, because it happened to be a subject which, from accidental causes, had been present to his mind judicially, ever since he had occupied a seat on the bench; and therefore if he now forgot the result of that consideration he had formerly bestowed upon it, he should be quite unpardonable. It was about fifteen years ago that this question arose at Braintree, as to whether, when the parish would not make a church-rate, the churchwardens could not do it in invitum. That came to be considered, first in the Court of Queen's Bench, and was then carried into the Exchequer Chamber, and elaborately discussed, he (the Lord Chancellor) being one of the Judges of the Exchequer at that time, and his noble and learned Friend (Lord Campbell) being then, as he believed, Attorney General, was one of the counsel by whom the question was argued. It was very deeply considered, and certainly there was no disposition on the part of the Judges to warp the law; they looked into it most laboriously, endeavouring rather, if they could, to find that there was authority for saying that the churchwardens could impose that rate; and they would have been glad to come to that conclusion; but they found that there was no such authority, and consequently they declared against the rate. But, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the Judges to that effect, Chief Justice Tindal did throw out a suggestion which he (the Lord Chancellor) was sorry for, and which he did not conceive to possess any weight; but, although the Chief Justice was delegated to declare the opinion of the Judges together, he (the Lord Chancellor) should protest against its being considered, that every opinion expressed by him, and not material to the discussion, should be taken as what the other Judges who were present concurred in. He thought at the time that the suggestion of Lord Chief Justice Tindal would involve parties in expense, without any beneficial result. That suggestion was, whether, as it was the duty of the parish, by the ancient immemorial law of the land, to keep the church in repair, there might not be some doubt whether, when the parishioners were met to see how that should be done, those who chose to say, "We will not vote anything," did not put themselves in the same position as voters who, in the election of a Member of Parliament, chose to throw away their votes on something quite beside the purpose of the election; and whether the remaining parishioners might not then, although the minority, proceed to make the rate. The course thus suggested by Chief Justice Tindal was taken, and the question came before the Court of Exchequer again; and in the beginning of 1850 the Judges delivered their opinion. He, himself, thought the minority had no such power; and he gave his reasons. Mr. Baron Parke and Lord Truro took this same view; but the majority of the Judges decided in favour of the rate. It was brought, by appeal, before the House of Lords, but he (the Lord Chancellor) took no part in their Lordships' decision, though he thought it was a perfectly correct one. This being the state of the law, the churchwardens could not make a rate; the minority could not make it; then who could make it? The right rev. Prelate had asked, whether the parish was not liable? Undoubtedly, the repair of the church was part of the trinitas necessitas, so called by the old Saxon law, to keep the churches, the roads, and the bridges in repair. But it was an obvious maxim, that where there was no legal remedium, there was no jus; and such an obligation could not be enforced. The remedy, such as it was, was absolutely impracticable, and one it was quite ridiculous to speak of. In ancient times the predecessors of the right rev. Prelate, when the Church of England was Roman Catholic, knew how to enforce anything of this sort. It was doubtful whether they ever imposed an interdict upon a whole parish, but they could excommunicate all the parishioners individually. But, to talk of that being a remedy in these days was absurd. The right rev. Prelate said, there was practically a substitute for it; and he referred to an Act by which, in case of a person under sentence of an ecclesiastical court, the Court of Chancery could formerly issue a writ de excommunicato capiendo, under which the person might be imprisoned. It is not quite so now; but if the person refused to submit to the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, that being certified to the Court of Chancery, a decree might be made requiring him to do so; and if he still refused, that would be taken as a contempt of Chancery, and a writ de contumace capiendo might be issued, and the defendant be put in prison—it was to be presumed, in such a case as the right rev. Prelate contemplated, until the church was repaired. But practically, there was no remedy; for nobody was bound to lay a rate: that was only the method adopted, by way of a bye-law, to keep the church in repair; and all the Ecclesiastical Court could do was, to lay hold of any parishioner, whether he was one who had voted for a church-rate or not, and to proceed against him, because his parish had not got its church in repair. But it was perfectly ridiculous to suppose that, in the nineteenth century, this could be tolerated for a moment. Such was the state of the law; and if the right rev. Prelate thought the case would be remedied by retaining the law in that state, others would not be so sanguine of it; because no sane man would ever institute any such proceeding. The right rev. Prelate had referred to some modern Acts of Parliament, giving the power of sequestration. But for what? Not for not having the church repaired, or for not making a rate, but for not paying a rate which had been lawfully imposed. No question if a rate was lawfully made, there were plenty of means of enforcing the payment of it; but the difficulty was to get the rate properly made. This subject had engaged the attention of the Government and of preceding Governments, and the real desideratum was to find out some mode of keeping all these valuable buildings in repair without causing that irritation of the minds of persons dissenting from the Church which they not unnaturally felt at being called upon to maintain a church to which they did not belong.

He agreed with the right rev. Prelate that to talk of not paying the rate from conscientious scruples was in most cases a mockery; but the fact was that persons objected to pay church-rates, because they did not like the expense of having to keep up their own places of worship, and being bound at the same time to contribute to those of churchmen. It might not be a very highminded feeling, but it was not very unnatural. Any person who should propose a plan which should offer a reasonable security for keeping the churches in repair without irritating the feelings of those who differed from the Church, would confer a great boon upon the community, and would deserve well of the country. It would be wrong now for him (the Lord Chancellor) to say what the Government contemplated. An hon. Gentleman in the other House had obtained leave to introduce a Bill upon this subject; but he could not yet say how far that measure might be adopted or improved upon, or whether, later in the Session, or next Session, the Government might not feel it expedient to undertake the question.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he entirely concurred with the right reverend Prelate, that the abolition of church-rates would, through the Church, strike at the cause of religion, and at the rights especially of the poorer members of the Church of England. He very much doubted whether the means for enforcing the levying of a church-rate could be applied: but, at the same time, he was confident that their Lordships would not agree to the Bill which was likely to come up from the other House, and the object of which was, he understood, simply to abolish church-rates. He was by no means without hope that eventually a measure would be devised which would secure the rights of the poor, and provide efficiently for the maintenance of the fabric and for the necessaries requisite for the performance of divine service, and yet should not be encumbered with the many difficulties which at present rendered the enforcement of church-rates almost nugatory.

LORD CAMPBELL thought that the House and the public were very much indebted to the right rev. Prelate who had initiated the present discussion. The subject was one of the highest importance and would not brook delay. The Bill, as their Lordships knew, was pending in the House of Commons, which would probably be shortly laid before their Lordships, for the total abolition of church-rates, without providing any substitute. To that Bill he never would give his assent, for he believed it was absolutely necessary to maintain the establishment and to provide for the efficient performance of religious worship. He confessed that the proposal for the total abolition of church-rates deeply shocked him, and he was surprised that it had met with support from some quarters in which he thought a strong opposition would have been manifested; for he looked upon such a measure as neither more nor less than one of spoliation. While, however, he thought the right rev. Prelate had done good service in bringing the matter before the attention of the House, he was of opinion that the right rev. Bishop had made use of a false argument in opposition to the Bill; for he could confirm the statement of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, that at present there was no means whatever of enforcing the making of a church-rate, although, when the church-rate had been made by the majority of the district, there was no difficulty in enforcing its payment. In the Roman Catholic times of this country there was no such difficulty, for the effect of the ecclesiastical censure was then tremendous, and those who refused to make the rate were cursed with bell, book, and candle, and cut off from the benefit of the sacraments. Since the Reformation there had been no instance of a successful personal proceeding against persons who refused to make a church-rate. The first attempt was made in the time of Lord Kenyon, when an application was made for a mandamus to compel the making of the rate; but that learned Lord had decided that he had no power to interfere, and referred the parties to the ecclesiastical tribunal, and that decision had been followed to the present time. He (Lord Campbell) believed that if stringent measures were adopted, such as imprisoning parties who refused to make the rate, the effect would be most injurious upon the interests of the Church. He should rejoice if some measure could be suggested which, like the measure in substitution for the church-cess in Ireland, would provide for the support of the fabric and the maintenance of Divine worship in churches, while at the same time it would relieve Dissenters from the payment of a rate to which they conscientiously objected.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER briefly replied, reiterating his statement, that by the statute of 1833 it was distinctly provided that every order made by an ecclesiastical court should be obeyed, under the penalty of writ de contumaciam capiendo. Whether it were for the enforcement of a rate already made, or for the making of a rate, it was the same thing; and he was able to say, as he had said before, that it had been proved by experience to be effectual, for in several cases it had been put in force; and as soon as the threat of putting it in force was made known, the rate was made. By the very confession of the agitators at Braintree, they dreaded the exercise of that power.

WAR WITH RUSSIA—CONDUCT OF THE WAR—PETITION.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE said, he had to present a petition from merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and inhabitants of Bristol, praying that their Lordships would be pleased to take such steps as were in their power to induce Her Majesty's present Ministers to establish a strict blockade of the enemy's ports, and to make such representations to the Prussian Government as should compel that Power to close the overland trade with Russia. At the same time he wished to move for certain returns relating to the various products of Russia, in order to show that there had been more than the usual quantity imported from that country recently, and to prove the inefficiency of the blockade of last year. He also wished to ask in what manner the Government proposed to allow the trade with the enemy to be conducted in future? It appeared to him that this subject was the most important that could by any possibility occupy their Lordships' attention. The disposal of everything rested with a higher Power; but, humanly speaking, he considered that the Government were responsible either for peace or war. He believed it to be in their power, by an energetic and vigorous policy, to bring the war to a speedy termination; or, failing in that energy, to make the siege of Sebastopol another siege of Troy. He trusted that their Lordships would excuse him if he borrowed a phrase used in another place, to the effect that "it was the policy of Government to inflict the maximum of injury upon the enemy, and the minimum of injury upon ourselves." Now, with regard to inflicting the maximum of injury on the enemy, the question naturally arose, in the first place, had we done so? and next, was there any reasonable prospect that we should do so in the next campaign? War was declared upon the 28th of March, 1854; and, as the law stood at that time, it was felony, if not treason, for any subject of these realms to trade with the enemy. That wholesome law was departed from, unfortunately for this country, for it was his sincere conviction that, had we adhered to it, instead of attending Vienna Conferences with "bated breath and whispering humbleness," instead of appearing as suppliants suing for peace, and submitting to the humiliation of a refusal, we should have Russia at our feet, begging for peace upon any terms, and imploring us to save her from the fury of a nobility whom our measures had driven to beggary and despair. The Government, last year, declared their intention to establish a strict and vigorous blockade. The blockade of the Baltic was tolerably effective; the blockade of the Black Sea was partial, and unfortunately, the partiality was in favour of the enemy; for while we blockaded the mouths of the Danube, and shut in from the markets 2,000,000 quarters of corn belonging to our friends, we left all the ports of the enemy open, and let out millions of quarters of linseed belonging to the enemy. The British merchants, relying on the repeated assurances of the Government, regarded the Black Sea as tabooed, and, looking upon it as treasonable to trade with the Black Sea, went to Africa, to India, and elsewhere, and brought a large supply of linseed into this country. But the enemy was beforehand with them, and they were obliged to sell their produce at a depreciation of 15 per cent. In this case, therefore, the maximum of injury was inflicted upon British merchants, while the maximum of profit was enjoyed by the enemy producers. It appeared, from the best authentic accounts, that more than 10,000,000l. of gold and silver went into Russia from this country in the first year of the war for goods received. It was to be presumed that the Government would not renew the blunders of last year, but that both in the Baltic and the Black Sea there would be a strict and vigorous blockade, as far as ships could effect it; but ships alone were abortive to make that blockade effectual. The petition he now presented was conclusive on this point. The land transit trade from Russia to

Russia must be diminished. By the mode in which it was conducted the goods were not, as heretofore, transmitted to St. Petersburg, but were brought through the departments of Smolensko, Tver, and Novgorod, to the frontier town of Taurogen, and were shipped thence to Memel, the distance of only a few miles. He thought that the Government were bound to do one of two things—either to raise the blockade, to diminish their naval armaments, to send out more land forces, which of course involved the shedding of more blood, or to take the alternative—enforce the blockade vigorously by sea and land. In the petition which had been entrusted to him the House was called upon to "take such steps as to compel the Prussian Government to close the overland trade with Russia." Now, upon the nature of these he would not enter: he left them to the responsibility of Ministers. His wish at the present moment was only to ventilate the subject, and he would first go to the question of prohibition. That was no new subject to the Government, past or present. That prohibition was urged upon the Government, and was recommended by the persons of all others who were most competent to advise them—namely, the merchants trading with Russia. Ever since he had a seat in either House of Parliament he had been an enemy of class interests; but he could not but advocate the views of these merchants, for he believed that their interests and those of the public were inseparably connected. Their advice was certainly preferable to sending 10,000,000l. to recruit the resources of the enemy. It had been asserted that such a prohibition would not succeed, and that it would inflict no injury upon Russia, and great injury upon ourselves. He was ready to take the converse of that proposition, and to prove that this step of entirely stopping the trade of Russia would inflict the maximum of injury upon Russia, and the minimum of injury upon ourselves. He argued this from the peculiar nature of the trade. Their Lordships were perfectly aware of what the export trade of Russia consisted. It consisted of a few articles of raw produce, raised by serf labourers, who were the property of the nobles of that country. The Russian landlord nobles were a military caste; they not only held all the principal commands in that country, but the whole army was raised by them. All the ranks were filled with them, from the field-marshal down to the private soldier. Every landlord was a soldier, and landlords were not a very patient order of beings in any country; but a soldier-landlord, with a sword at his side, was a man who, in a military country, was likely to make himself heard. Well, these exports were the property of the soldier-landlords of Russia. The exports formed the rent of the Russian nobility; any injury to the rent must be an injury to the nobility. Now, the policy of this country last year, and their policy this year, as it had hitherto gone on, was the very opposite of all the principles which they had been talking about, as to inflicting a maximum of injury upon Russia, and a minimum of injury upon themselves. One effect of these imperfect blockades had been to make the war popular with the people of Prussia. It in some degree reconciled them to the disgrace which the vacillation of their sovereign had brought upon them, and made the gain to their interest act as a counterbalance to their loss of honour. But a far more serious consequence of our policy was, that it made the war popular with Russia, and its soldier-landlords; and as long as that feeling existed, let our successes be as brilliant as they might in the Crimea, peace was utterly impossible. There could be no peace until they made those exponents of public opinion in Russia, those military landlords feel more severely the pressure of the war. But so far from that having been the case, the land transit of last year had produced the most beneficial effect to them. They netted, it was true, a little less profit on their exports; but their horses and carts for carriage were an immense source of profit to them—so remunerative, indeed, was it found to be that they brought carts and horses from the confines of Siberia. A good system of policy on the part of this country would not have brought about such a state of things. The object of this country ought to be to make the war unpalatable to the Russian nobility, to make their exports unsaleable, to make their serfs unprofitable. On this export trade the Russian noble entirely depended, and his habit being always to live up to his means, and generally far in advance of them, he had no money to fall back upon as a resource whenever that export trade should fail him. There was no middle class in Russia. No man in Russia could supply himself with a conveyance of his goods to the marts; that was wholly in the hands of a small but a highly-respectable body of British merchants; the Russian landlords could not convey their goods to the port of shipment; that was, again, supplied by British merchants. Now, this body of Englishmen, as respectable a body as any in that country, had been in existence before the present capital of Russia was known, and when its site was a desolate spot amid the marshes of the Neva; even before the name of Peter the Great was known they were carrying on trade at Archangel between Russia and England. He dwelt upon this, because these merchants had repeatedly declared to the Government, that if the orders in Council permitting the trade were repealed, and that the Statute law were to be enforced as it was before those orders were made, they would entirely discontinue the Russian trade. They ought to be believed in that assertion, for it was obvious that men of their high character were not disposed to risk their honour as British merchants, and to incur disgrace and banishment by evading the law. He therefore wished their Lordships to bear in mind the inevitable consequences that would arise from their not carrying into effect the statute law which made it treason to trade with an enemy. That, independently of any measure to prevent the ingress of Russian products, would destroy at once two-thirds of her exports, and three-fourths of the capital by which it was carried on—for three-fourths of her money transactions were conducted in London. It was said, that if these merchants did abandon the trade, another class of persons would come forward; but who were they, he should like to ask? Who could succeed those merchants? Let us see what would be their requirements. First, they must be men of capital and of credit from the very nature of the trade. It should be specially borne in mind that the trade was one of advances, and unlike the usual system of trading. Everything was to be paid in advance, and who were the persons to do it? Were they merchants of any other country? They did not exist in Russia; they did not exist in Prussia. There were none. He did not wish to speak of any particular country or place, but he understood that there was nobody so low in purse or in credit as the Prussian merchant. If they took the test of solvency—namely, the rate of discount, he believed that the Prussian merchants paid 20 per cent discount, and were those the persons to take up a trade involving an enormous capital? The idea was utterly preposterous. But capital was not all that was required. They might have capital and credit too, but something more was still wanted. Great local knowledge and a personal acquaintance with the native agents were equally necessary, for without these all the capital and credit they could command would not enable persons to understand the way in which this trade was carried on. The British merchant made repeated advances from the beginning of Autumn to the beginning of March in the following year to a set of native agents. Those agents had to travel from 500 to 1,000 miles into the interior, visiting the various fairs and marts of commerce, for the purpose of bringing back the commodities which they were commissioned to purchase. They were often delayed, and had to wait the melting of the snow to enable them to float their river boats, by which they were conducted to the port of shipment. The question would naturally suggest itself, what security had the merchants that these men would not run away with the property ? There was none whatever — practically speaking, there was no redress at law for such a contingency. But, notwithstanding, it was known perfectly well that the trade was carried on profitably—and why ? Because from its being an old-established trade there had sprung up a degree of confidence on the one hand, and a principle of good faith on the other, which prevented those parties from dealing unjustly. How, he would ask, was it possible that such a class of men should suddenly spring up in Russia ? They might, no doubt, in the course of years, but, in the meanwhile, what would become of Russia—what would be the condition of Russia ? That was the point to which he wished to call the attention of their Lordships—it was the most important question of all. By adopting the course these merchants demanded, her exports would be destroyed; the rouble would be of the value of a French assignat; in two years her finances would be in the most inextricable confusion; and the soldier landlord, the man upon whose courage and fidelity the Sovereign must depend in the day of battle, would be rendered desponding, despairing, and disaffected, when your prohibitive policy had taught him that not merely had the war stripped him of his serfs—not merely had it burdened him with taxes, but that it had brought him to beggary and ruin by having entirely deprived him of his trade. Could the war be carried on for a single year by Russia under these circumstances ? He was not speaking entirely in ignorance of the country or of its people, for he had travelled from one end of Russia to the other. He was there in 1824, and saw a little of the temper of the nobility at that time, and they talked just as freely of the insurrection which took place there the year after as the clubs of London now talked of the efficiency of Her Majesty's Government. There appeared to be an undefined notion abroad in this country that if a stop were put to our trade with Russia we should be ruined for ever; but what foundation was there for such a notion ? There was none whatever. Their Lordships must bear in mind that the raw products of which the Russian exports consisted were not of so rare a kind that one country only could produce them, but were to be had all over the world. The Russian hemp, for instance, was by no means the best that came into the market, and he found by the prices current of last Saturday that 16 per cent more was obtained for the Manilla hemp than for the hemp produced by Russia. It could also be obtained from the North of France and Lombardy, and from the latter country the Government had procured several thousand tons. Passing from Europe to India, they would be lost in wonder at the superabundance in that country of the materials which were now obtained from Russia; all the vegetable creation seemed to resolve itself into the three products of hemp, flax, and if not into animal tallow, at least into a substitute for that article. From the Himalaya Mountains to ten degrees of south latitude there were whole tribes of trees which furnished a substitute for hemp. The nettle also produced rope superior to the best Russian rope, for a Russian fibre had broken with a weight of 160lb. while a fibre of nettle had held 400lb. without breaking. The Philippine Islands, again, produced the Manilla root, which, after clothing 4,000,000 of people, came into the market as the best rope in the world. Iron was also a great competitor with hemp. When the iron cable had first superseded the vegetable cord cable, down had gone the price of hemp, and it had again gone down since the patent for iron wire had expired; the iron cable was now used by all the great companies and shipmasters, being as efficient for the standing rigging of the smallest yacht as for that of the largest vessel. It was stated by Messrs. Noble, the great hemp brokers, that if Her Majesty's Ministers would declare that it was unlawful to trade with Russia for one year, such an impetus would be given to the growth of these textile fabrics that they would be able to compete with the products of Russia in price, quality, and quantity. Russian flax was beaten by that of Belgium, the latter having a superiority of 12 per cent in the market. Here, again, they might depend upon a supply from India, as the immense population of that country, and their great industry and mechanical skill, rendered those products the most profitable which partook of a vegetable and a manufacturing character, such as hemp and flax. Last year, as president of the Agricultural Association in his own county, he had urged the cultivation of flax upon the agriculturists of Norfolk, but he was glad they had not taken his advice, as he had given it in reliance upon the assurance of the Government that an effective blockade would be maintained. Ireland, too, was peculiarly fitted for the production of this fibre, from the comparative cheapness of its labour, the humidity of its climate and the fertility of its soil. Several of the northern provinces had already cultivated it. The celebrated engineer, Sir J. M'Neill, had, on the faith that the blockade of the Russian ports was to be strictly enforced, laid 600 acres under flax, but the market was glutted by Russian produce, and he could now only sell at a loss. He now came to the question of tallow. Before war was declared Russian animal tallow had been losing its price in the market, having been superseded by vegetable oils, and the taking the duty off soap had had a great effect in extending the number of substitutes for animal tallow. Messrs. Price and Co., the largest candle manufacturers in the world, who employed no less than 2,000 workmen, had not a cask of animal tallow upon their establishment, its place being supplied by palm and other vegetable oils. The palm, from which this oil was obtained, grew along the coast where the slave trade prevailed, and it had been found that in proportion as the slave trade diminished, an increase took place in the quantity of oil produced, so that by rescinding the order in Council of April 15, 1854, they would contribute to diminish the slave trade. France, again, which was a great exporter of candles and soap, abstained almost entirely from the use of animal tallow, substituting for it what was commonly called the African ground or pig-nut, which they obtained from Algeria—it, however, was not a nut, but of the pulse kind, and grew in almost every part of Africa; it was easily cultivated and very remunerative. In order to show how unexpectedly and the facility with which substitutes were found for tallow, he would cite the instance of the Irish Peat Company, started for the purpose of extracting from peat a naphtha oil, which was worth about 1s. per gallon; but it was soon found that this oil possessed the high lubricating quality necessary for machinery, and in a few months the price rose from 1s. to 5s. a gallon. Peat was not a very scarce thing in Ireland, and he therefore hoped that the Peat Company would contribute their quota towards substitutes for Russian tallow. The Government had, thanks to the blockade, inundated this country with Russian goods—hemp, which was at 70*l.*, had fallen to 50*l.*; flax, which was at 52*l.* per ton, had fallen to 37*l.*; and tallow had declined from 70*l.* to 48*l.* An argument used against the rescinding of the order in Council was, that it would tend to encourage trade among neutral Powers, and that in Prussia flax mills would spring up on every side. But what was the mighty competition which was feared? In Prussia there were but nine flax mills; they might erect others, but in order to do so they would require time, capital, skilled labour, and machinery, which latter must all come from England. No manufactory could be erected under 50,000*l.*, and while these preparations were being made it was supposed that Prussia would be allowed to continue in her quasi state of hostility, breaking the law of this country by breaking the blockade, and allowing goods to come through her territory, supplying at the same time our enemies with arms and munition of war. But Prussia might be found either employed in stopping the ingress of Russian goods, or might find an allied fleet blockading her ports in the Baltic, and a Russian army on the right bank of the Rhine; or there might, perhaps, be an appeal to the nationalities, which had been expressed by more than one of Her Majesty's Government without any great disfavour being shown, he believed, by the Chief Minister. But if matters came to the worst this competition on the part of Prussia would but end in a few million more yards of Silesian linen. They were also told that in Italy and Holland this neutral trade would be carried on; but the question again arose, where would they find capitalists and men? He had dwelt thus much on the importance of putting an end to the war by stopping the funds by which the trade was carried on, but he did not attach much importance to the machinery by which the progress of Russian products into this country was to be prevented. The plan proposed by the petitioners was, that the importer of Russian products should make an oath before the consul that such goods were the products of another country. Now, he admitted that these certificates might occasionally be evaded, that an importer might be found to swear to anything; and a blundering consul—though he hoped the Government would only appoint efficient men—might not be able to discriminate between Riga, St. Petersburg, or Lombardy hemp. But he derived his belief of the efficiency of certificates of origin from the nature of the men who would be employed; for they must be men of capital and credit. He thought he had already shown that the sacrifices which this country would be called upon to make would not be so serious as might be supposed; but if we were not prepared for sacrifices, why did we go to war? No nation with a great external trade could enter upon war without making sacrifices. War entailed two burdens—the heavy expenses of naval and military establishments, and the interruption of the trade of the country with which it was at war, this latter loss being in proportion to the extent of trade with the enemy. How did this country stand with regard to Russia? This country could, in a commercial point of view, better go to war with Russia than with any other country, as Russia had, during peace, inflicted more evils on this country than any other by its hostile tariffs. In fair and open trade between two countries, in the exchanges of products for products, the balance of gold and silver was sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other. How did this country stand with regard to Russia in this respect? From the return of exports and imports last laid on their Lordships' table, he found that British exports to Russia amounted to 1,228,404*l.*, while this country received from Russia imports to the amount of 9,200,841*l.*, so that this country had to pay a balance of gold and silver to Russia of 7,792,437*l.* The object of this country ought to be to make Russia suffer more than it did; but, as our trade was of more consequence to her than her trade was to us, it was as evident as a demonstration in Euclid that, under the present state of things, this country had been inflicting the maximum of loss upon itself, and the minimum on Russia. We took two-thirds of the whole of the exports of Russia, while Russia took scarcely one-eightieth part of the products of this country. The account, therefore, stood thus:—By losing our custom, Russia lost two-thirds of her export trade, and nearly all the capital by which it was carried on; while we lost a very trifling portion of our trade, and the capital was our own. But even if so favourable a balance could not have been shown, was this a question which ought to be treated in a miserable huckstering style? Were Russian hides and tallow to be weighed against English blood and sinew? Viewing the question even in this, the narrowest point of view, it would be found that we had the means of greatly crippling the commerce and enterprise of Russia, without proportionate sacrifices on the part of this country; for it would cost us only one-eighthieth part of our exports to reduce the imports of gold and silver into Russia by something like 7,792,000*l.* He thought the bargain would be a good one. Well, now, that would be precisely the effect of the step he was urging upon Government; although it might be opposed to the principles of political economy. No doubt it is very much opposed to political economy, but so is war in every shape and form. In truth, war and political economy, as every one must see, are incompatible with each other. War implies a negative of all trade; hence no principles of political economy, or any other principle connected with peaceable relations, are involved.

LORD STANLEY or ALDERLY said, that there could be no objection to the production of the papers for which the noble Earl had moved, although he was afraid that they would not give much information, as they afforded a very imperfect test of the amount of commerce carried on. The noble Earl complained that the blockade had been imperfectly exercised, and that there had been little injury inflicted upon the Russian trade while a great deal had been done to our own. He would beg to direct their Lordships' attention, however, to the circumstances under which the blockade had been first instituted. We were engaged in a war with Russia in concert with an ally who entertained a different opinion to ourselves with regard to questions of maritime law and the rights of belligerents. They recognised the right of neutrals to carry property of the enemy without being subject to the right of search, and that was one reason which rendered it necessary to deal tenderly with any interference with the commercial proceedings of the enemy. But there was another circumstance which rendered that necessary. It was the practice for merchants in this country to pay in advance for Russian produce, and the consequence of that system was, that at the time when the blockade was instituted, nearly all the Russian produce which was lying in the ports of the Baltic and the White Sea was, in point of fact, the property of English and French merchants, and not of Russians. If a blockade, therefore, had been immediately instituted upon the breaking out of the war we should have injured our own subjects, and not those of Russia. For this reason it was thought desirable that the period for commencing the blockade should be extended, and that time should be given to allow of the exportation of all such produce from Russian ports; but that order in Council had only reference to British merchants and in no way altered the law. The noble Earl, stated that the blockade had not been enforced. Upon this point he must join issue with the noble Earl, for he believed that since the blockade had been enforced in the White Sea and the Baltic not one single cargo of Russian produce had been exported from any Russian port upon those seas. With regard to the Black Sea, he admitted that the circumstances were different, and he regretted that they were so. We had not had ships available for the purpose of enforcing a blockade in the Black Sea; and the consequence was that a large amount of produce was imported thence into this country, to the benefit chiefly of the Greek merchants. A blockade had, however, now been imposed (from the 1st of February) of every Russian port, and there was no single port of the Black Sea, the Baltic, or of the Gulf of Finland, which would be in future unblockaded. The geographical position of Russia was such that a marine blockade could without much difficulty be established, because, although there was a large extent of territory, the maritime outlets were few. He would now call their Lordships' attention to the actual result of the blockade which had actually had a great effect in crippling the Russian trade. The total importation of hemp for the year ending March,

1854, was 1,208,371 cwt., of which there was from Russia 802,706 cwts., or 66 per cent., while from other countries there were 405,665, or 34 per cent.; while in the year ending March, 1855, the total imports were 1,281,076 cwts., of which there were from Russia 422,439, or 33 per cent., and from other countries 858,637 cwts., or 67 per cent.; so that the proportions were actually reversed. It must be also remembered, that all excess of Prussian trade in this article over the importation of the previous year had been considered Russian produce. The total importation of tallow for the year ending March, 1854, was, 1,210,151 cwts., of which there were from Russia 840,137, or 69 per cent., and from other countries 370,314, or 31 per cent. In the year ending March, 1855, the total imports of that article were 797,090, of which from Russia there were 424,064, or 53 per cent., and from other countries, 373,026, or 47 per cent., showing a decrease in the total imports of 34 per cent., and a decrease in Russian imports of 49 per cent., but an increase from other ports of 1 per cent. With regard to flax, the imports for the year ending March, 1854, were 974,864, quarters, of which from Russia there were 749,908, or 77 per cent., and from other places 224,956, or 23 per cent. In the year ending March, 1855, the total imports were 854,771 cwts., of which 403,663, or 74 per cent. were Russian, and 451,108 quarters, or 53 per cent., exports from other countries, showing a decrease in the total imports of 12 per cent., and of 46 per cent. in the Russian imports, but an increase in the imports from other countries of 100 per cent. There were some other details with regard to tar, bristles, and raw cotton, with which he need not trouble the House at that late hour. He had referred to these returns to show the very considerable effect produced even by the partial blockade for a portion of the last year, and the more rigorous one in the present. What then, might be expected next year, when there would be a continuous and effective blockade?—And it was only reasonable to suppose that the trade of Russia with other countries had been reduced in a corresponding degree. There could be no doubt that the trade of Russia would be most materially crippled. He now came to the main proposition of the noble Earl—that referring to the absolute prohibition of all Russian produce, whether exported from

Prussian or from other German ports and the entire cessation of their own commerce with Russia. Now, he would ask the noble Earl how it was possible to arrive at a knowledge as to whether the produce imported from neutral ports was Russian or not? Were the English consuls at every Prussian or other German port to give their certificates that the produce exported was the production of the country from which it was exported? It was notorious that certificates of origin were most fallacious in their operation; and, if merchants were unscrupulous enough to engage in trade with an enemy, they would not prove an effective means of putting a stop to such trade. Even if it were possible to arrive at the knowledge that the articles so exported were Russian produce, and not that of the country from which they were exported, they would not be able to get rid of the difficulty, for when produce had been submitted to any process of manufacture, however slight, it became a "manufactured article" and was considered the produce of the country from which it was exported, and not of that from which it originally came. Now, with regard to tallow, a very slight operation was sufficient, in law, to convert it into a manufactured article. So with regard to hemp and flax. Under those circumstances, it would be very difficult to certify what was really Russian and what the produce of other countries, and he need hardly point out to their Lordships how extremely cautious they should be in interfering with the genuine trade of neutral countries. He trusted that the noble Earl would be satisfied with what had been already done, and with what was likely to be done in the present year, when the blockade would be efficiently and immediately enforced, more especially when he considered that half of the Russian trade had been destroyed, her mercantile marine swept away, and her men of war were ignominiously shut up within her arsenals or sunk in the entrance of her ports, whilst the British flag floated triumphantly unquestioned on every sea; when the noble Earl considered all these things, he would find that he was hardly justified in saying that the blockade had been entirely ineffectual.

LORD BERNERS was glad that this question had been brought before the House, and expressed his gratification at hearing that the blockade was to be rigorously carried out. He should be still further gratified if the policy, which he believed to be the true national policy, were further pursued, by the destruction of private property in Sebastopol, which had, as he understood, hitherto been spared.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE, in reply observed that the returns from which the noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade had quoted were incomplete, and therefore no inference could be drawn from them. If he found the assertion of his noble Friend, that this blockade would be made effectual, established by the fact, he should be perfectly satisfied; but should that not be the case, he certainly would at some future period put his views in the form of a Resolution, and take the sense of the House upon it.

Petition ordered to lie on the table; also, Return ordered of the quantity of Hemp, Flax, Tallow received into this country from Russia and Prussia between the 1st of January and the 27th of April in the years 1853, 1854, and 1855 respectively.

House adjourned to Monday next.

ENGLAND AND IRELAND IMPROVED COMMUNICATION BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF CHANDOS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that it was limited to the passenger and postal service between Holyhead and Dublin. A great many statements had been circulated in opposition to this Bill; but they were chiefly founded on a misapprehension of its objects.

Mr. CAIRNS said, he did not rise to ask the House to reject the Bill, but he wished that the second reading should be deferred. The Bill went to authorise the London and North-Western Railway Company to build and own steam-boats, in conjunction with the Dublin Steam-Packet Company, to ply between Holyhead and Dublin. But there was not a word in the Bill to show how the communication was to be improved. In fact, the company had no contract with the Government, and from an answer given to a question he put the other night, it appeared that the Government was about entering into the contract on the old terms. It was the duty of that House not to give the Parliamentary powers asked for, until the company showed that they had a provisional contract with the Government, and had bound themselves to perform the service better than it had been done before. He did not wish to negative the Bill altogether; but would move that the second reading be deferred for a month, in which interval the company might ascertain whether they could obtain a contract with the Government.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day month."

MR. FRENCH said, he begged to remark that although the Motion was not in accordance with the usages of the House when an intention existed to throw out a Bill, nevertheless the present Motion amounted in substance to the same thing. For years everybody had been complaining of the difficulties of the passage between England and Ireland. A responsible company now came forward prepared to supply competent vessels, which would perform the voyage in between three and four hours—the time at present occupied being frequently upwards of twelve hours—they also undertook to supply passage-boats twice a day, and they were prepared to bind themselves not to raise the fares. He therefore thought he was not demanding too much when he asked the House to assent to the second reading.

MR. KIRK said, he should support the Bill. There were at present three most imperfect communications with Dublin daily. This was the first time in the history of the two countries that a feasible means of communication had been proposed. The company undertook that the journey between London and Dublin should be accomplished in twelve hours.

MR. VANCE said, he was inclined to give but a comparatively qualified assent to the Motion for the second reading. Indeed, as the Bill was framed, the Dublin Chamber of Commerce had the strongest possible objection to it. However, as, through the instrumentality of that body, certain modifications had been introduced into it, he was willing that the Bill should go into Committee, hoping to see it further improved during its progress.

MR. LINDSAY said, he was opposed to the Bill, for he believed that the public interests would not be served by the monopoly which it proposed to confer on the London and North-Western Railway Company. He had no doubt that the public would gain most by competition rather than through the medium of the new and extraordinary powers proposed by this Bill.

LORD NAAS said, he thought some such measure as the present necessary to improve the present state of communication between the two countries. The House, he thought, would do well to allow the Bill to be read a second time, but it would be necessary to take especial care in the Committee that the public interest should be guarded against injury from the consequences of a monopoly.

MR. H. HERBERT said, he entirely repudiated the notion propounded by the hon. Member (Mr. Lindsay) that the principle upon which the Bill was founded was a novel one. Already the Chester and Holyhead Company had been granted powers precisely analogous to those now looked for; and this Bill might be said only to transfer these powers from one company to another.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, that, in the case of that particular company, such a power had been given upon the recommendation of a Committee presided over by the late Sir Robert Peel, but it was granted under certain limitations, and the effect of the Bill now proposed would be to extend that power to other companies, without extending the limitations which were considered prudent by the Committee to which he had referred.

MR. BRIGHT said, that having had occasion sometimes to go across to Ireland, he had often expressed to his friends how glad he was that he was not an Irish Member, for he could never forget the miserable steamboat accommodation existing between the two countries. He had very little doubt that if this were under American rule that such a disgraceful state of things would not be suffered for a moment to endure. The Bill should certainly receive his support, as he believed through its instrumentality, at all events a partial remedy would be introduced.

MR. CARDWELL said, the hon. Member who had last spoken had overlooked the fact that the special privilege given to the Chester and Holyhead Railway Company was given on the express condition of their providing proper boats and improving the communication. He dissented from the Motion of the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Cairns), and thought that the great question for the House was, whether railway companies should be enabled to become owners of steam boats. The question was, whether the particular case before the House came within the rule of the exception. That rule was, whether the steam-boat communication was ancillary to the railway traffic. The House would do well to look at the way in which the Bill was drawn; for the House had had great difficulty in dealing with railway companies. He meant to oppose the Bill on principle, as it was originally drawn; but, with the modifications proposed, he thought the best course would be to send the Bill before a select Committee. In his opinion, the power engaged in supporting the steam-boat communication round the shores of this country had done far more than all the associated railway companies that ever existed for improving the commercial intercourse of this country.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he regarded the postponement of the Bill for a month as tantamount to its rejection for the present Session. The question of principle had been dealt with before, and was not new to the House. The Chester and Holyhead Company possessed the identical powers which it was now proposed to transfer to the London and North Western Company. The South Eastern and South Western Companies had similar powers for running steam-boats. With these various precedents, it was for the House to decide whether, with the interests of Ireland so deeply involved, they would reverse the principle they had hitherto acted upon. The real point for the Committee and the House to decide was whether the public would be better served in every respect in the manner proposed than they would be by any other scheme.

MR. MUNTZ said, he thought that no sufficient reason had been shown for departing from the usual course on this Bill. He should support the second reading.

MR. CAIRN said, he would not press his Amendment.

NATIONAL EDUCATION—QUESTION.

MR. MILES said, he wished to ask the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) whether it was his intention to make an alteration in Committee in his Bill for the better encouragement of education in England and Wales, in the words by which he proposed to raise money for educational purposes, by substituting parochial for union charges?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was quite ready to state to his hon. Friend what he had stated privately to several hon. Members, and which he ought to have stated on the second reading of the Bill. He had reconsidered the reasons which had induced him to propose a union rather than a parochial rate, and he was of opinion that he could accomplish the object he had in view without adopting an arrangement which, in the case of parishes already sufficiently provided with school accommodation, would involve some hardship, if they were called upon to pay a further charge in order to make up the deficiencies in another place. On this ground he should, in Committee on the Bill, propose that the rating should be parochial, and not union.

SIEGE AMMUNITION—QUESTION.

COLONEL WYNN said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance whether there was any truth in the report that many of the fusees fitted to the shells fired from the mortars in the batteries before Sebastopol were made so long ago as 1798, 1801, 1804, and 1812; whether it was true that the powder employed to fill many of the shells was damaged powder restowed, instead of being fresh and good powder; and whether the new pattern fusees made in 1853, and subsequently, had not frequently been found to be inefficient?

MR. MONSELL said, he had submitted the notice of the hon. and gallant Member's question to the Director General of the Ordnance, who had informed him that all the fusees for the 10-inch mortars sent from Woolwich had been made in 1853 and 1854; that all the 13-inch mortar fusees also were of the new period of manufacture, but that those sent from Malta were probably of an earlier date, though he was unable to give the particulars. It was the custom to use restowed powder for filling the shells, on account of its being softer in grain than the other powder. With regard to the third question, he was happy to say that the pattern fusees made in 1853 and subsequently, had not frequently been found inefficient, but they had been improved upon in 1854, and the fuses of the newest make were those now in use in the Crimea.

COMPENSATION FOR LOSS OF HORSES—QUESTION.

COLONEL WYNN said, he would now beg to ask the hon. Under Secretary at War whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give any compensation to those officers whose horses—provided at their own expense—had been, destroyed by the labour they had been subjected to in bringing up from Balaklava to the camp clothing, medical comforts, and provisions for the soldiers; whether any compensation would be given to those officers whose horses were left behind at Varna when the army embarked from thence for the Crimea?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that under the regulations now in force an officer, whose horse was lost whilst in course of being used for public purposes, was entitled to compensation. Whether compensation would be given under the circumstances specified would, of course, depend upon the nature of the case in which the claim was made, and no individual case had been yet brought to his knowledge.

THE CONVICT BARANELLI—QUESTION.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. baronet the Home Secretary, and in order that he might be enabled to make a brief statement on the subject to which it referred, he begged to move that the House at its rising adjourn to Monday next. The right hon. gentleman and the House were aware that at the present moment there was in one of the prisons of this city an Italian who had been convicted of murder, who was under sentence of death, and whose execution, he understood, was fixed for next Monday. He wished to call the attention of the Home Secretary to the fact that at the trial of this individual, Mr. Shaw, the senior surgeon of the Middlesex Hospital, in which institution the prisoner had been for some time, was subpoenaed by the Crown as a witness. Mr. Shaw attended in Court and expected to be called, but the counsel for the Crown, having ascertained that the evidence of Mr. Shaw would be in favour of the prisoner, refused or neglected to call him and to place his evidence before the Court. Now, although such a course might be perfectly legitimate in the case of disputes relating to property, he would put it to the right hon. baronet and to the House whether, when the life of an individual was at stake, and when the prosecutor was the Crown, acting on behalf of the justice, and dignity, and impartiality of the law, the conduct of the counsel for the Crown was justifiable? He could not help expressing his strong opinion that the conduct of the counsel for the Crown was entirely unjustifiable in refusing to call a witness whom he had himself summoned to the Court, that witness being better acquainted than any other person could be with the actual state of mind of the prisoner, and the plea set up by the prisoner's counsel on his behalf being a plea of insanity. He believed these facts had been laid before the Home Secretary in a memorial from Mr. Shaw. Evidence had been given on the subject by Mr. Henry, the assistant-surgeon at Middlesex Hospital, a gentleman who, although young, gave promise of eminence in his profession; but it was not likely that so much importance would be attached to the evidence of this gentleman as to that of his senior, Mr. Shaw, who was ready, had he been called upon, to give similar evidence. The evidence of the gentleman who had been called to prove the sanity of the prisoner rested, he believed, entirely upon one interview with him, and was not, therefore, to be placed in the balance against the evidence of medical Gentlemen of high character who had attended him for several weeks. He (Mr. Bright) had in his possession a memorial, signed by Dr. Conolly, of Hanwell, by Dr. Baly, of Millbank prison, by Dr. Forbes Winslow, by Mr. Shaw, and by Mr. Henry, in which they expressed their opinion strongly in favour of the insanity of the prisoner at the time he committed the act. He did not mean for a moment to imply that the Secretary of State had not given his most dispassionate and earnest consideration to this case; but he (Mr. Bright) thought the cause of public justice and the reputation of our Courts would be greatly damaged if importance were not to be attached to the fact that a medical man, who was more competent than any other person in the Kingdom to form an opinion on the sanity of the prisoner, was in Court, having been subpoenaed by the Crown, and that the counsel of the Crown, having, during the trial,

taken means to ascertain that the opinions of this medical gentleman were in favour of the prisoner, neglected or refused to put him into the witness-box, thus excluding evidence which, in all probability, would have had conclusive influence upon the jury, and might have saved the life of the unfortunate prisoner. He understood that Mr. Bodkin, the counsel for the Crown, stated that he did not call Mr. Shaw into the witness-box because his name was not on the back of the brief, but he (Mr. Bright) had been informed that it was a common thing not to place the names of medical witnesses upon briefs. It might be asked why the counsel for the prisoner had not called Mr. Shaw? Their omission to do so, he supposed, must have arisen from some misunderstanding, but that omission could not affect the claim of the unfortunate prisoner—who might have committed, and who probably had committed, this crime while in a state of insanity—to have justice done to him. He might remind the House that not long ago a Mrs. Brough had been charged with the murder of several of her own children, and she escaped capital punishment, he believed, because it was considered that no person in a sane state of mind would have committed so atrocious a crime. In that case, however, he believed no evidence was given of the conduct of the prisoner before the commission of the crime which could lead to the belief that she was insane. He rejoiced at her escape, and he was not without hope that, from the laches with respect to the evidence of Mr. Shaw, something might be done to save from the gallows the unfortunate man to whose case he was referring. He wished to ask if the Secretary of State could inform the House whether it was the custom for counsel of the Crown to take such advantages as he had mentioned against prisoners placed in such critical and desperate circumstances, and whether it was not the duty of counsel in a case of this kind to adduce all the evidence, in order that a prisoner might have every chance for his life which the law fairly gave him?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he was sure the House would feel the danger and inconvenience of entering into a discussion with reference to a criminal trial which had taken place according to the ordinary law of the land. He could only state that a representation, signed by several medical gentlemen, with reference to the case to which the hon. Member for Manchester had directed attention, was received by him on Monday evening last. He immediately referred that representation to Mr. Justice Erle, before whom the case was tried, and he had since received the report of that learned Judge. He (Sir G. Grey) and the Under Secretary of State had given their most careful consideration to the case, and the decision at which he had arrived was one with regard to the justice of which he did not feel the slightest doubt, considering the obligation which rested upon him to administer the law of the land. With reference to the omission of the witness on the trial to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, he was not himself competent to speak without a full knowledge of the facts of the case; but he might state that Mr. Justice Erle did not think that Mr. Bodkin, who conducted the case for the Crown, had been guilty of any laches. The witness was in court, and might have been called by the counsel for the prisoner, and the statement which he could have made was, he believed, brought under the notice of the Judge.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY—

MR. LAYARD.

MR. EWART said, he would take that opportunity of doing an act of justice, which he owed to himself and to a gallant relative of his who was now serving with the army in the Crimea. Some days ago the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard), at a dinner at Liverpool, openly stated that of the officers who had been promoted to the Staff in the Crimea only one, Major Ewart, of the 93rd Highlanders, a relative of his (Mr. Ewart's), had obtained a first-class certificate at Sandhurst; and the hon. Member added, "I don't know whether he owed it to any Parliamentary influence; I hope not." With regard to the first portion of this statement, that his (Mr. Ewart's) gallant relative was the only officer appointed to the Staff in the Crimea who had earned distinction at Sandhurst, he (Mr. Ewart) felt it to be his imperative duty to state that that was a most inaccurate and incorrect representation, and that he was convinced nothing could be more painful to the feelings of his relative than to be placed in this unjust pre-eminence; for there were many meritorious officers serving on the Staff in the Crimea who had obtained the same distinction as his gallant relative. The hon. Member for Aylesbury had, therefore, though no doubt unintentionally, fallen into an error. The fact was, that the hon. Member had adverted to one return, and omitted to notice previous ones. This much he (Mr. Ewart) felt was due to those meritorious officers who stood upon an equal footing with his relative, and he knew that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the War Department would do justice to those officers. But the question which he felt bound to ask the hon. Gentleman was this, whether any such influence was used, as affecting his relative, as might be inferred from the observations of the hon. Member for Aylesbury? whether any such influence was directly or indirectly, or in any degree whatever, resorted to? and whether his gallant relative owed his position on the Staff in the Crimea to any other cause than his zealous and ardent endeavours to perform his duty to the State?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he thought that, as notices of other questions bearing upon similar topics had been given, it would be better that they should be put before he made any statement to the House.

MR. H. B. BARING said, he had also a question to ask the hon. Under Secretary for War. He found in a newspaper of the day previous the following statement of the services of officers recently promoted in the Coldstream Guards, made under the sanction of the name of the hon. Member for Aylesbury—

C. J. Burdett, nineteen years' service, without purchase; no active service.

J. W. Newdigate, fifteen years' service, without purchase; no active service.

Lord Dunkellin (son of the Marquess of Clanricarde), nine years' service, by purchase; Alma.

W. G. Dawkins, eleven years' service, without purchase; Alma.

C. W. Strong, sixteen years' service, without purchase; Alma, Inkerman.

C. F. Wilson, sixteen years' service, by purchase; West Indies, Alma, Inkerman.

Lord Burghersh (son of Lord Westmoreland), twelve years' service, without purchase; Staff.

Hon. A. Hardinge (son of Lord Hardinge), eleven years' service, without purchase; Staff.

Now, it did so happen that the last two officers were men who had seen more service than any of the officers whose names stood before them. With respect to Lieutenant Colonel Lord Burghersh, he had served through the whole campaign of the Punjab in 1846, and had also been present at the battle of the Alma, the despatches announcing which victory he was thought worthy to convey home. With regard to Lieutenant Colonel the hon. Arthur Hardinge, he had been through the campaign of the Sutlej, where he was present in three general engagements, and he understood had a horse killed under him; he was moreover present at the battle of the Alma, and was in the charge at Balaklava, where he accompanied the Scots Greys in their successful charge, headed by General Scarlett; and last, though not least, he was at the battle of Inkerman. He would be glad to know why, in the hon. Member's opinion, the ominous and unpalatable word "Staff" was the only one which could be applied to designate the services of those two distinguished officers? He asked whether the hon. Member was aware that the services of those two distinguished officers had been omitted from the usual record, or whether they might attribute it to the high-minded and generous feeling of the hon. Member for Aylesbury, that he had omitted all mention of their services because the one happened to be the son of an Ambassador and the other son to the General Commanding in Chief?

GENERAL PEEL said, he regretted extremely to be obliged to call the attention of the House to another passage of the speech delivered by the hon. Member for Aylesbury at Liverpool, to which the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) had already adverted. But he thought the House would agree with him that when an accusation was made against an officer holding the distinguished position of General Commanding in Chief, that he had been guilty of scandalous conduct in reference to promotions in the army, still more especially when his own son was concerned, and when an opportunity had been afforded to the hon. Member of retracting this statement, and he had refused to do so—then that an opportunity should be afforded him in his place in that House, of repeating the accusation, and stating the grounds on which he made it. He had no personal feeling against the hon. Member; and nobody could regret more than he did, that the hon. Member had not availed himself of the opportunity afforded him to correct his error and apologise for the insinuations he had made by the very temperate and excellent letter of the hon. and gallant officer the Member for Wigan (Colonel Lindsay). No one could approve more highly than he did the conduct of those who came forward to bring accusations against persons in high station, if they believed the truth of the charges, and were satisfied of the evidence on which they made them; but on the other hand

he could not express strongly enough, in language consistent with Parliamentary usage, his opinion of the conduct of those who, merely to extract a passing cheer, merely to gain a little fleeting notoriety, reiterated an accusation, the truth of which he had at least strong reason to doubt. The portion of the speech to which he referred was as follows :—

" I will give you an instance of a friend of mine, a gentleman who served throughout all those battles, and distinguished himself most signally ; he came over to this country sick and almost dead. There were two men above him, officers in one of the guards' regiments, who had never left England ; they were members of high families and they were promoted without purchase ; but my friend was a poor man, and they made him pay 3,000*l.* for his commission ; and why ? Lord Hardinge's son was next to him, and got his commission without purchase. I say these things are scandalous."

And so he would say too, if true. There could not be the slightest doubt to what this accusation amounted—that an officer was compelled to purchase his commission in order to enable Lord Hardinge's son to obtain his without purchase. After that statement was made appeared the letter of the hon. and gallant Member for Wigan (Colonel Lindsay) on which the hon. Member for Aylesbury changed his ground ; and it would be necessary for him, though he was sorry to take up the time of the House, to go through the circumstances of the promotions specified in the letter which the hon. Gentleman had written. When his hon. and gallant Friend pointed out that the two officers immediately preceding Colonel Wilson were both of them engaged in the Crimea, the hon. Gentleman then said, that these were not the cases he meant, and that he alluded to the promotions of Colonel Burdett and Colonel Newdigate without purchase. Now, the first promotion, that of Captain Burdett to be Lieutenant Colonel, took place on August 22, 1854, long before the army went to the Crimea. He did not hesitate to say, that however gallantly Colonel Wilson might have distinguished himself there, and everybody had done so, Colonel Burdett's services were quite equal to his. But, supposing the system of selection by merit to be established, he should like to know who could have been selected in the Coldstream Guards when these promotions took place but Captain Hardinge ? He was the only officer who, on the 25th of August, 1854, in his rank in the Coldstream Guards, had seen any service whatever. Colonel Newdigate's promotion took place on the 14th of September, 1854, also before the army went to the Crimea, and, therefore, came strictly under the existing regulations—providing for promotion by rotation, consequent on deaths or accidents. The two next vacancies were to be filled by purchase. The two senior officers, knowing that there was a strong probability of their obtaining promotion without purchase, withdrew their names, and Lord Dunkellin was consequently promoted on the 3rd of November, 1854. The next two steps were got by Colonels Dawkins and Strong, both of whom were promoted on vacancies caused by death. Then came the vacancy which arose on the death of Colonel Mackinnon, which was filled by Colonel Wilson. The hon. Member (Mr. Layard) seemed to think that there was some power at the Horse Guards to decide on the occurrence of a vacancy whether it should be filled by purchase or not. But this was not the case ; nor was it true either that Colonel Wilson was compelled to purchase. No doubt, as long as the mixed system of promotion by purchase and seniority was in existence there must be a great deal of chance as to whether vacancies should be filled up by purchase or not ; but when the hon. Gentleman said that Colonel Wilson was compelled to purchase, he must have known, or, at least, Colonel Wilson must have known, that there was no compulsion in the case. Colonel Wilson could have withdrawn at the very last moment, and the result would have been that Colonel Hardinge might have purchased over his head ; and then Colonel Wilson would have had the first colonelcy afterwards that fell vacant. The question whether, as Colonel Wilson seemed to think, he should have succeeded without purchase was a question with which Colonel Hardinge had nothing to do. It was a question between Colonel Wilson and the family of Colonel Mackinnon ; and depended on the rule that when an officer was killed in action, before his promotion was known at head-quarters, the price of that promotion should not be lost to his family. He was sure that the House would be glad to see that rule carried out to the fullest extent possible ; and he would show that it had always been the case that when promotions took place by purchase, and any unfortunate event occurred, such as the death of the promoted officer in action, before the promotion was known at head-quarters, the promotion was cancelled, and the friends of the officer received the money again. The hon. Member for Aylesbury had had some correspondence with Lord Hardinge, and he (General Peel) alluded to it in order to show that the hon. Member had had an opportunity offered him of retracting the charges he had made. He would now read the correspondence which had passed between the hon. Gentleman and Lord Hardinge on the subject, to show that the former had had full opportunity to retract his charges.

" 15, Great Stanhope Street, April 28, 1855.

" Sir, I have read a speech of yours made at Liverpool in which you charge me with conduct so corrupt in the exercise of military duties, in the case of the promotion of my son, to the injury of Lieutenant Colonel Wilson, of the same regiment, that you have thought proper to characterise the transaction as a most scandalous one. I most distinctly declare your statement to be utterly untrue. My son's correspondence with Lieutenant Colonel Wilson having closed, and the letters being in your friend's possession, I have now to require that you will immediately retract the unfounded charge made in your speech, or be prepared to show upon what authority you have preferred it.—I remain your obedient servant,

" A. H. Layard, Esq., M.P."

The reply to this was as follows:—

" 9, Little Ryder Street, April 28, 1855.

" My Lord, In reply to your letter I beg to refer you to Hart's Army List as my authority for alluding to the promotions in the regiment of Coldstream Guards in a speech at Liverpool. It may be impossible to trace the motives which may have led to such promotions, but, as a public man, I believe I am expressing the convictions of a very large portion of the public when I characterise as 'scandalous' the promotion by purchase of a regimental officer who has seen long and arduous service, and the promotion immediately afterwards, without purchase, of the two officers next to him, one of whom is your own son, and both of whom have been serving on the Staff. Similar instances are, unfortunately, too numerous to lead to any other conclusions than those to which I have come. It is asserted that Colonel Wilson's promotion took place in accordance with an inviolable rule of the service. In other cases, I have reason to believe such rules have been distinctly violated. Such being my conviction, I have nothing to retract from the statement I made at Liverpool—a statement, I may add, for which Colonel Wilson is in no way responsible.

" I have the honour, &c.

" A. LAYARD.

" The Lord Hardinge."

" 15, Great Stanhope Street, April 28,

" Sir, I have this evening received your letter of this date.

" I must remind you that I do not complain of your opinion that promotion in the army by purchase is scandalous.

" You accused me in your speech at Liverpool of having promoted my son without purchase, to the injury of Lieutenant Colonel Wilson, who had been made by me to purchase his promotion, and that my conduct in doing so was most scandalous.

" This charge you decline to retract, although your friend Lieutenant Colonel Wilson admits that he attaches no blame to the Horse Guards authorities.

" Your assertion that the rule applied by me in Lieutenant Colonel Mackinnon's case has been violated in others, is contrary to the truth.

" It is a waste of time to hold any further correspondence with one who makes such unfounded accusations, and who obstinately persists therein."

" A. Layard, Esq., M.P."

He would now proceed to put the House in possession of the precedents upon which the course taken in Colonel Mackinnon's case was founded.

" In 1847, a majority by purchase having become vacant in the 73rd Foot, stationed at the Cape of Good Hope, Captain Baker, the senior captain of that regiment for purchase, was promoted to the vacancy on the 13th of November, but was killed in action on the 13th of that month; his promotion was accordingly cancelled in the Gazette of the 11th of February, 1848, on the ground that it could not be known at the Cape at the time of Captain Baker's death, and Captain Brown, the next senior captain for purchase, was promoted to the majority thus vacant by purchase. Lord Fitzroy Somerset's letter of the 28th of September, 1848, to the Lieutenant General commanding at the Cape at the time was as follows:—' The vacancy was filled by purchase in strict accordance with the regulations of the service, the deceased officer not having known of his promotion, and consequently not having been in a position to exercise the functions of the superior commission.'

There were even still later precedents—

" In August, 1854, the retirement of Captain Saunders (who was brought in to sell) from the 4th Foot, having created a vacant company by purchase, Lieutenant Skinner, the senior of his rank for purchase in that regiment, was promoted to the vacancy. This officer, however, died on the 14th of August, 1854, and the 4th Regiment being then stationed at Gallipoli, at that date no intimation of his promotion had been in any manner received there; on which ground the appointment was cancelled in The Gazette of the 15th of September, 1854, and Lieutenant Cocks, the next senior lieutenant for purchase, was gazetted to the vacant company by purchase on the 11th September, 1854. In evidence of this promotion being in strict accordance with the rules of the service, the military secretary drew up the following minute, dated the 8th September, 1854; a copy of which was transmitted to the officer commanding 4th Foot:—' On searching for precedents as to such a case, that of Captain Baker, who had been promoted to a majority in the 73rd Foot on the 12th of November, 1847, was discovered. That officer having been promoted on that day, was killed on the 19th of November (the following day) by a party of Kafirs. His promotion was in consequence cancelled, on the ground, that, never having heard of his promotion, he

had consequently never been in a position to exercise the functions of the superior commission. [See the letter from the Military Secretary of the 23rd of September, 1848.] The same course is, therefore, to be taken in the case of the promotion of Captain Skinner, which it is accordingly to be submitted to the Queen shall be cancelled, and the next senior lieutenant for purchase recommended for the succession.'—C. YORK, Sept. 8, 1848."

"Ensign and Lieutenant Disbrowe was promoted by purchase on the 3rd of November, 1854, in succession to Captain and Lieutenant Colonel Cumming, who retired. It having, however, been reported that Mr. Disbrowe was killed on the 5th November, before he could have known of his promotion, an officer was brought into the regiment from the Rifle Brigade, by purchase, and the money was returned to Mr. Disbrowe's family."

We would now proceed to state what occurred in the case of the promotion of Lord Burghersh—

"Horse-Guards, 25th of April, 1855.

"Colonel Crombie, of the Coldstream Guards, returned to England in October, 1854, on the recommendation of a medical board, having been seized with a serious illness in the camp near Varna in the month of August.

"On the 18th of December he forwarded to Lord Strafford a certificate from Dr. Ferguson to the effect that he was still labouring under the consequences of his former illness, and expressing an opinion that a return to the arduous duties in the East might be considered as certain death to him. Under these circumstances he applied to be placed upon half-pay for a time, stating that he had served thirty years on full pay.

"Lord Strafford, in forwarding this application, expressed a hope that some arrangement might be made for bringing in a lieutenant-colonel from half-pay who would sell out, and that the vacancy might thus be filled by promotion in the regiment. This, however, could not be done, as, in the first place, there was at that time no lieutenant-colonel on half-pay who had applied to be brought on full pay to realise the value of his commission; and, in the next, there was a similar case of the lieutenant-colonel of the 51st Regiment, who was anxious to be placed on half-pay, and the officers of that regiment, from the length of their services, had a prior claim to what is considered an advantage, namely, the step of lieutenant-colonel going by purchase through the regiment, instead of a lieutenant-colonel being brought from the half-pay and no promotion taking place.

"The applications, however, in both cases stood over for a time, that if any lieutenant-colonel on half-pay should offer to sell, advantage might be taken of the opportunity to give promotion in both regiments.

"On the 29th of January, however, Colonel Crombie renewed his application, and applied for some leave of absence, in case any further delay was likely to take place.

"Lieutenant-Colonel Blackburn, on half-pay, had by that time applied to sell, but it was not thought fair towards the old officers of the 51st Regiment to allow the promotion to go into the Guards, and put in an officer as lieutenant-colonel of the 51st to remain in it, and Lord Hardinge would have been especially indisposed to do so, as it would have been for the apparent benefit of his son, there being at the time no knowledge of what might be the intention of Colonel Upton as to remaining till he was a general officer, or going previous to obtaining the rank on half-pay, as many other officers of the Guards similarly circumstanced have repeatedly done. Lieutenant-Colonel Blackburn was therefore placed on full pay in the 51st Regiment on the 13th of February, and immediately sold out, the promotion going through the regiment.

"Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Burghersh, on the staff pay unattached, was brought into the Coldstream Guards, vice Crombie, on the 9th of February, and remains in the regiment.

"It may be added that the date of the submission to the Queen of Lord Burghersh's removal from the staff pay to the Coldstream Guards, vice Crombie, was the 7th of February, 1855.

"At that time the only death of a general officer which had been reported at the Horse Guards was that of General the Hon. T. E. Capel, who died on the 3rd of February.

"Two more were required for the promotion of Colonel the Hon. A. Upton to be a major-general: these occurred, one on the 7th and the other on the 9th of February, namely, Sir Patrick Stuart and Lieutenant-General Sir William Eustace, but there was no idea at the time of the probability of the death of either of these officers, and it so happened that, by Lord Burghersh having been brought in as he was, Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge lost a step."

That brought him to the case of Lieutenant-Colonel Hardinge. By a rule of the service, when three general officers died the senior colonel was promoted. Now, it so happened that after all these promotions to which he had just referred, three generals died in one week. The senior colonel then on the list was Colonel Upton, of the Coldstream Guards, who was promoted to the major-generalship, and then, in strict course, Lieutenant-Colonel Hardinge obtained his promotion. He would not add a single word to this statement. It was for the House to decide to whom the charge of "scandalous conduct" most properly applied.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he was glad that he had been preceded by his hon. and gallant relative, for after the statement which he had just made, and the correspondence he had read, no one could help coming to the conclusion that there had been hardly a stronger instance in which, what he must call, a disposition to damage and discredit the Government had led an hon. Member to distort the correct view of a question, and to blind himself to its just and true merits. With regard to the first question which had been put to him—namely, as to the appointment of a relative of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) to the staff—he would first of all beg leave to call the recollection of the House to the words used by the hon. Member for Aylesbury, at Liverpool, in reference to this point. The hon. Member was arguing that, though we had a special college instituted for the instruction of our officers in their military duties, yet when a Member of that House moved for a Return of the names of the officers who had distinguished themselves at that college, and who had been placed on the staff in the Crimea, that return showed that only one of all who had received certificates of merit at Sandhurst had been so appointed. The hon. Member then, inferring, by what he said after, that that officer had for a relative an hon. Member in that House whose views on public questions generally harmonised with those of Her Majesty's Government, went on to express a hope that he had not been appointed to the staff in consequence of his Parliamentary influence, thus leaving it to be inferred that the gallant officer was appointed through the influence of his hon. Friend behind him. The only answer which, in most cases, it would have been necessary to give to such an insinuation, would have been to disclaim any Parliamentary influence in the matter, and to refer the appointment of the officer in question entirely to the distinction which he had gained at college and his proficiency in the discharge of his military duties. It so happened, however, that there was not the shadow of a foundation for saying that this officer's appointment was owing to the influence of any hon. Member of that House, or to any other Parliamentary influence, for the fact was that he (Major Ewart) was not placed upon the staff by any authority in this country. When the first part of the army was sent out, Lord Hardinge, in conjunction with Lord Raglan, did select the officers to be placed on the staff, but with reference to all the subsequent staff appointments, Lord Hardinge left them all in the hands of Lord Raglan. Captain Ewart was appointed to be a deputy assistant quartermaster in the army in the Crimea, from the 93rd Foot, by Field Marshal Lord Raglan, on the 26th of September, 1854. He was promoted to a regimental majority on the 29th of December, and by a general order of Lord Raglan on the 12th of February, 1855, he was ordered to rejoin his regiment for duty, and he then ceased to belong to the staff. Therefore, the Government at home had nothing whatever to do with Captain Ewart's appointment. Nor was it true that only one officer who had obtained a certificate of merit at Sandhurst had been placed on the staff of the army in the Crimea. The hon. Member had here been led into an error, which had been occasioned in this way:—An hon. Member having moved for a Return of the officers holding staff appointments in the Crimea, who had obtained certificates of merit at Sandhurst, and the Return being presented, the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) had mentioned to him (Mr. Peel) that his relative's name had been omitted from it. Finding, on inquiry, that there had been such an omission, he directed a supplemental Return to be prepared which was presented under the heading "Supplemental Return to the order of the Honourable House of Commons, dated the 9th of February." The only name in that paper was the name of Major Ewart, but the original Return, of course, comprised the names of all the officers holding staff appointments in the army in the Crimea, and he understood there were ten or eleven officers who had obtained certificates of merit at Sandhurst who had been placed on the staff of the army there. With regard to the question of his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. H. B. Baring), he begged to say he did not appear there as the advocate of Lord Hardinge, whose advocacy had been undertaken and ably performed by his hon. and gallant relative opposite (General Peel), but when he heard it stated that the Commander in Chief, the head of one of the principal departments which regulated the affairs of the army, had acted in the appointment of officers on principles that were scandalous, it was natural that he should desire to give the House some information on the subject. In his speech at Liverpool, the hon. Member for Aylesbury said—Who are the officers in the Crimea who have most distinguished themselves—who have sought reputation at the cannon's mouth? They are your regimental officers. And what is the nature of the reputation which they have acquired? The Government have treated them with indifference, and the only reward they have got is the sympathy of the people of this country. The hon. Member endeavoured to draw a line between the indifference of the Government and the cordiality with which the services of these officers had been recognised by the public. He said—I will give you an illustration of what I mean—I will take the promotion in the Coldstream Guards. There were, he said, two officers who had never left the country, who were men of high family; and next to them an officer who was a poor man, who had been with the army in the Crimea, and who had returned to this country sick and almost dead. After him came the son of the Commander in Chief. And now see how these five officers have received their promotion. The first two, who had never left the country, received their promotion without purchase, and the man who was poor, and who had seen service in the Crimea, was compelled to purchase his promotion because he was followed by the son of the Commander in Chief. Everybody supposed that the hon. Gentleman referred to the two officers immediately above Colonel Wilson, who were named Dawkins and Strong, who had both been at Alma and Inkerman, and who could not therefore be said, in the invidious sense which he was afraid the hon. Gentleman intended the words to bear, to have seen no service. The hon. Member, however, had since explained his language, and had endeavoured to draw a distinction of rather a nice character:—"What I said," explained the hon. Member, "was, officers 'above' Colonel Wilson, not officers 'next above' him." The two officers to whom the hon. Gentleman now said he referred were Colonels Burdett and Newdigate, who had obtained their promotion by the deaths of two captains at Varna. They were in this country, it was true, but not by their own consent. Some officers must remain in this country, and those to whose lot it fell to stay behind, no doubt would consider it a hardship that they were not allowed to accompany their brother-officers; but to lay down that where vacancies occurred abroad they must be filled up by officers upon the spot, so as to exclude those at home, would certainly be adding injustice to hardship. It was perfectly just, therefore, that these two officers should be appointed to fill these vacancies. Colonel Wilson, it must be remembered, was not originally desirous of purchasing his step; but when he found that Captains Dawkins and Strong had withdrawn their names from the list for purchase, preferring to take their chance of the death vacancies, he wrote to his friends in England, desiring them to purchase the step for him, being anxious to step over the heads of Dawkins and Strong. He acted entirely (and of course no one could blame him for it) with a view to his own interest. The battle of Inkerman soon after occurred, and Captains Dawkins and Strong got their promotion without purchase, two captains having been killed in that action, and on Lieutenant Colonel Mackinnon dying, the vacant captaincy was purchased by the friends of Lieutenant Colonel Wilson. The gallant Gentleman complained that he thought he had some claim to promotion without purchase, but at the same time, he said that he was not acquainted with the established rule of promotion under the circumstances to which reference had been made. With regard to the established rule of the service in such cases, no doubt could exist with regard to it after what had fallen from his (Mr. Peel's) hon. and gallant relative. He felt bound, however, to say that, when an officer was promoted and died before he was aware of his promotion, or before notification of it had reached head-quarters, if he was killed while serving in a subordinate rank, it was a very humane and proper arrangement to restore to his relations the money which had been paid for promotion from which he had never derived any advantage. In the present instance, the money paid for the promotion of Captain Mackinnon had been restored to his relations, and a commission became vacant, not by death, but by purchase, and the offer of it was first made to Colonel Wilson, who purchased it, and obtained his step. One thing, however, was quite clear, that whether Colonel Wilson had obtained his step gratuitously or not, it could not possibly have benefited Colonel Hardinge. If the vacant commission had not been bought by Colonel Wilson, Colonel Hardinge would have been only too glad to purchase it. The hon. Gentleman said that Colonel Wilson was made to pay for his promotion in consequence of Colonel Hardinge being next, and of his being the son of the Commander in Chief. He (Mr. Peel) had shown that Colonel Hardinge derived no benefit from Colonel Wilson's purchasing his promotion, and as regarded his being the son of Lord Hardinge, he had merits of his own which deserved to be borne in mind. Whatever had been the merits of Colonel Wilson—and he was most unwilling to say one word disparaging the actions and services of that gallant officer, for he believed him to have proved himself a most gallant and meritorious officer—still the services of Colonel Hardinge had not been less conspicuous. Was it, or was it not the case that Colonel Hardinge had gone through the campaign of the Sutlej, and been present at Sobraon, Moodkee, and Ferozeshah, and also at the Alma, at Balaklava, and at Inkerman? Colonel Hardinge was not necessitated to go to the Crimea at all, but had volunteered his services. He was desirous of not losing the opportunity of seeing service, and, having been appointed to the staff, was present at those three great battles. Then, it appeared to be thought that some favour had been shown to Colonel Hardinge under the circumstances in which he had obtained his commission. Now, was that the case, or was it not? Colonel Hardinge obtained his promotion in consequence of the promotion of Colonel Upton, to be a general officer. Colonel Upton was aware of the certainty of his obtaining that promotion if he lived, and he might have sold his commission in the Guards; and if he had sold it, the commission would have been disposed of by purchase, and Colonel Hardinge would have purchased the step. Colonel Upton, however, took a different course, not certainly at the suggestion of Lord Hardinge; he chose to retain his colonelcy in the Guards, and by the death of three general officers he became a major general, and Colonel Hardinge, in the usual way, succeeded to the vacant commission according to the established rule of the service. Such were the plain and simple facts of the case. The hon. Member for Aylesbury had said that honesty was the best policy. He (Mr. Peel) felt that the Government of this country had been carried on upon principles of honesty and honour. He gave the hon. Gentleman credit for being an honest man, and he thought that it was the part of an honest man, now that it had been shown that the statements made by him at Liverpool were not in accordance with the facts of the case, to come forward manfully and to admit that that he had made statements injurious to public men, who were as honourable in their actions, and as ready at any moment to lay bare their motives as the hon. Member himself, or as any other hon. Member of that House.

Mr. LAYARD: Sir, I will address myself first to the question placed on the paper by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart). I beg to assure that hon. Member that in the passage in my speech to which he has referred, I had no intention to make any reflection upon his gallant relative, nor do I think any person who heard me believed that I had any such intention. On the contrary, what I stated was rather a matter of praise to him, for the very fact of having taken a first-class at Sandhurst was evidence to me that the Government had no hand in his promotion. [“Oh, oh!”] I repeat that I intended to cast no reflection upon that officer; and at the time I did not know that he was a relation of the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the statement I then made as to the number of persons on the staff who had taken honours at Sandhurst, I fell into an error in the manner described by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War. But I think the Government are a good deal to blame for the error into which I fell. If their returns are so ill drawn up that names are omitted from them, and then, on account of their gross omissions, questions are made and other Returns are then prepared, I say Government is to blame. I did not see the first Return. The second Return alone fell into my hands; and although it is a supplemental Return, it is not so headed on the sheet.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: It is headed “Supplemental Return.”

MR. LAYARD: It was not on the face of the Return.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL (showing the Return): Yes; it was on the face of the Return.

MR. LAYARD: Well, I did notice it, but I frankly admit that I fell into the error from not having seen the first Return, and I think, as I have said, that Government are equally responsible with myself for the error. [Loud Cries of “Oh, oh!”] The House may say, “Oh, oh!” but if it possessed the information which I possess, it would know how Returns are cooked up to suit the purposes of Government, and if I have been led into error by the omission of a name in a Return, Government must share the responsibility with me. Now, with regard to the second statement made by the hon. Member opposite (M. H. Baring)—these matters are, no doubt, of a very painful and delicate nature. There are few men in this House who dare get up to speak the truth on this subject. There are very few officers who, when such questions as these are mooted, dare speak the truth with respect to them. If hon. Gentlemen had seen the letters on this subject that I have received during the last few days. [Cries of “Read!”] No, I shall not. [Cries of “Name!”] Nor shall I name them. To name the writers here, would be ruin to those officers, and you know it very well. I stand here prepared to take upon myself the responsibility of what has occurred. I shrink not from it. I had no knowledge of the various rules that apply to promotions in the army. I stated nothing but facts, forming my own opinion upon them. I may get indirect evidence and information on which I may guide my own judgment; but I am not going here to betray those who have given me that information, and who perhaps would be ruined, if it were known whence my information came. Now, in the first place, with respect to the use of the word "staff," in the letter of mine which has been referred to, I did not mean by it to make any reflection upon Colonel Hardinge or Lord Burghersh. I had a list given me by a military man, and that I have printed. I certainly wish I had added a statement of the services of the officers who have been referred to. With regard to Colonel Hardinge, I have had the honour of a personal acquaintance with him. I believe that there is not a more gallant and meritorious officer in Her Majesty's service. I know that he has distinguished himself on more than one bloody field, and there is no one whose promotion I would more heartily welcome. [Ironical Cheers.] It is all very well to question my feelings on this subject, but I am conscientiously stating them. The question is not one of persons. I do not grudge Colonel Hardinge his promotion; but what I say is, that the promotion extended to Colonel Hardinge might be extended to others who may have distinguished themselves—not so much, perhaps, as Colonel Hardinge, but still who have distinguished themselves in the field. I venture to claim, and I think I have a right to claim, the indulgence of the House while I endeavour to show the grounds upon which I have acted. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (General Peel) has read three letters, forming part of a correspondence which has taken place between Lord Hardinge and myself, and I will now complete that correspondence by reading the last letter. That letter was as follows—

" 9, Little Ryder-street, April 27, 1855.

" My Lord—I cannot permit your letter to remain unanswered. I did not state, although you have thought proper so to assert, that 'the rule applied by you in Lieutenant-Colonel M'Kinnon's case, had been violated in others.' What I did state was, that 'such rules, that is, rules of similar character, had been distinctly violated.' I referred more particularly to the cases of Captain Heneage and Captain Lord E. Cecil, of the same regiment, although I am assured that similar cases are most numerous.

" After the tone of your letter and my convictions, I perfectly agree with you that it is a waste of time to hold any further correspondence, especially with one who at such a time as this can justify the cases to which I have alluded, and which have created so deep a feeling of indignation in the public mind.

" Your Lordship is quite at liberty to publish this correspondence, and I reserve to myself the right of doing so should I consider it necessary.

" I have the honour to be, my Lord,

It has been said by the hon. gentleman opposite, that there is a mixture of chance in regard to promotion in the army; but if we saw among a party of gamblers that one of them invariably turned up double sixes, would it not be fair to suspect that the dice had been tampered with? It is true that there are these chances, but I find that the happiest of them generally fall to the lot of those who have the least need of them, namely, those of either high connexion or party influence. That question I shall shortly bring before the House in the most extended form, and I think the country is fully prepared for its discussion. The country, I believe, is in no mood that admits of its feeling on this subject being trifled with—a feeling which extends to every branch of the public service. The public interest is sacrificed in every department of the State to private and party influences. Let me take for example the case of the two gentlemen whom I mentioned in my note. One is a gentleman named Heneage, who has two relatives in this House. He entered the army in December, 1853, and joined his regiment in February, 1854, or two months afterwards. He arrived in the Crimea with the draughts sent out in the autumn, and was present neither at the Alma nor at Inkerman. Yet he got a captaincy, without purchase, within ten months after his appointment, that is, in December, 1855—I mean 1854. (Ironical cheers from Mr. H. BERKELEY.) The hon. Gentleman is evidently eager to catch a cheer from anything, but his cheers are not creditable to the Ministerial benches. It is said to be an inviolable rule that no man shall be promoted to a captaincy until after two years' service. Well, if Captain Heneage had distinguished himself, I would be the last man to complain that an exception had been made to a general rule in his favour; but when I see this rule deviated from in this case and in several others, I say you have no right to talk of inviolable rules. Again, Lord Eustace entered the army in November, 1853, without undergoing service, and in December, 1854, for a company in the Guards. (Cries of "Question ! ") The Ministerial benches call "Question!" and, when I am answering your assertion about an inflexible rule, you won't allow me to show you that, where private interest is at stake, you care not a jot about your so called inviolable rule. Well, what happens ? On the other hand, Lieutenant Blackett, of the 93rd Regiment, I believe was in all the actions in the Crimea, and recommended for good service to the Government ; and what is the result ? He is transferred to the Guards, and though he had seen eleven years' service he is placed below this Captain Heneage and Captain Lord Eustace Cecil—one of whom had only served eleven months and the other between two or three years. Now, I hold myself responsible for these accusations, and, as I told Lord Hardinge, am not prepared to retract them. I only wish that we could go fully into this question, and that we had power to examine several officers in the army upon it. I wish I could call Colonel Crombie to give his evidence. That officer, I have been given to understand, was compelled to resign, that two others beneath him might be advanced—Lord Burghersh and Lord Hardinge's son—and, as I am informed, he was not apprised that he had been put upon half-pay until he saw the notice of it in the Gazette. So much for individual cases. A man in my position has a difficult part to play, being obliged to obtain his information as best he may from what he believes to be good sources. He may, therefore, make an occasional mistake, and I dare say I may here be mistaken ; but if I have done wrong to any individual I shall be the first in this House to get up and acknowledge it. But such is the present state of things, that there is scarcely an appointment in the army or elsewhere which, if the public looks into it, it does not at once find to be connected with the persons making it. Only three days ago I saw by the Gazette that a colonel of the staff had been named a general officer in the Turkish Contingent with local rank ; and, feeling that there must be some cause for this, when I turned to the Army List and other sources, I found that the individual is Colonel Cunningham, on the staff, who married a daughter of Lord Hardinge. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen may laugh, but, when these things are of daily occurrence, they justify position, and when disgrace—I am obliged to say—disgrace has fallen on the country, I say the people of England are in no temper to tolerate the approximation to what I may call "gross jobs." I may just observe that Colonel Wilson was not aware of the existence of this "inviolable rule" in regard to himself. Such, then, is my statement to this House. I will not retract what I have said, because from the bottom of my soul I believe it to be true. I am convinced that if men dared to get up in this House and declare what they believed, they would admit that there is some truth in what I have stated, for most of us must know that family and party influence has much to do with these promotions. As to Colonel Wilson, he is in no way to be blamed for what I have done. I rest my case upon the Army List, and take upon myself the entire responsibility.

MR. HARDINGE : I wish to say that I cannot add one word to what has fallen from my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), or from my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for War. I feel that I should only weaken the able manner in which they have dealt with the case were I to follow them into that part of the question ; but with respect to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Layard) as regards a gallant relative of mine, Colonel Cunningham, Brigadier General of the Turkish Contingent, that hon. Gentleman has ventured to characterise his appointment as neither more nor less than a job. Now, I must remark that Colonel Cunningham has seen service in the Chinese campaign under Lord Gough, that he was at Alma and Inkerman on the Quartermaster General's staff ; and I venture to say that if you were to ask my Lord Raglan or his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, to whose division he was attached, they would tell you that Colonel Cunningham is a most excellent officer. Therefore, when the hon. Member for Aylesbury throws in my teeth the appointment of Colonel Cunningham, I reply that my relative has justly and deservedly received his promotion, and defy him to call it in question. The hon. Member for Aylesbury, in his speech at Liverpool, seems to have dealt in inaccuracies of no common order. He said no officer had been appointed to the staff in the Crimea who had taken a first-class cer-appointment to his merits alone; but it so happens that Major Ewart did not take a first-class certificate, although he got what is called a special certificate for proficiencry. There are no less than five gallant officers on the staff in the Crimea now who took first-class certificates at Sandhurst, and I will name them. They are—Colonel Cameron, Colonel Stirling, Major Hacket, Major Morris, and Major Sankey. Sir, I have done with the hon. Member for Aylesbury. I will leave this matter in the hands of the House, who will doubtless form their own opinion as to who is right and who is wrong, and whether or not the transaction alluded to is scandalous.

MR. BYNG said, that those who were acquainted with the rules of the army knew that the appointments and promotions in the three regiments of Foot Guards did not rest with the Commander in Chief, but with the colonels of those regiments. He was authorised by Lord Strafford, the colonel of the Coldstream Guards, to say that whatever responsibility attached to the appointments and promotions which had been so much canvassed, rested with him, and him alone; and that he was fully prepared at all times and all seasons to justify them, according to the existing military regulations and the well-known precedents applicable to each individual case.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, the hon. Member for Aylesbury had been asked either to retract what was alleged by him against Lord Hardinge, or else to explain in what manner in this particular case of promotion his Lordship had been guilty of maladministration. Instead of doing this, however, the hon. Gentleman had carefully avoided addressing himself to the case in point, but had dealt in vague generalities; and though he told the House he would not retract, yet he had never attempted to show how Lord Hardinge had had the slightest influence upon his son's promotion. Having addressed himself to this question in the public journals, he (Colonel Lindsay) would not trouble the House with any further remarks upon this subject, except to reiterate all that he had therein stated. The hon. Member had accused the Horse Guards of giving promotion to Captain Heneage, who, he said, was not at the battle of Inkerman. He (Colonel Lindsay) believed it would be found if Captain Heneage was not at the battle of Inkerman, it was because at the time he was serving his country in the trench elsewhere, and that since this period the gallant officer in question had been constantly under the fire of the enemy. The hon. Member alleged that the rule had been broken through in this instance. Now, the facts were these—At the commencement of the war Captain Heneage was the junior ensign. By mortality, brevet, and other causes, the whole of the ensigns were swept off, and Captain Heneage was left at the top of the list, though at the time he had only seen one year's service. As, however, he had been under the fire of the enemy, Lord Strafford obtained sanction for his promotion, which thus took place contrary to what was then established as the rule of the service—namely, two years' service. This promotion, however, would not have taken place if it had not been for the services of Captain Heneage. With regard to Lord Eustace Cecil, the circumstances were these—A gentleman called upon Lord Strafford and informed him that Lord Eustace Cecil was most anxious to see service. He told him that when the 43rd were engaged at the Cape of Good Hope, Lord Eustace had then exchanged for the purpose of seeing service, but, unfortunately for him, active service had ended when his Lordship arrived there. The 43rd were then sent out to India, and while they were in that country the war broke out. Lord Eustace Cecil, still anxious to see service, endeavoured to exchange into a regiment at the seat of war, and accordingly exchanged into the 88th; and Lord Strafford considered this so meritorious that he gave him a commission in his regiment of the Guards. Now, Lord Eustace Cecil happened to be the son of the Marquess of Salisbury; but he (Colonel Lindsay) had it from Lord Strafford that, though he was undoubtedly acquainted with the noble Marquess as a Member of the House of Peers, he was also politically opposed to the Marquess of Salisbury, who had nothing whatever to do with the matter, and that Lord Strafford gave his son a commission simply because he appeared to be an officer anxious to see service and to distinguish himself. He (Colonel Lindsay) ought to have said previously, that, owing to the extreme rapidity of promotion in the Coldstreams, eleven officers had, in the course of the last year, been brought into that corps from other regiments, to reward them for their conduct at the seat of war. He must say that, to use the mildest terms, he thought it somewhat unfair that an hon. Gentleman should go down into the country attempting to excite the public sympathies and to justify his opposition to the system of promotions then in force by assertions and accusations every one of which were without the slightest foundation.

COLONEL NORTH said, he only rose to supply an omission made in enumerating the services of Lord Burghersh—namely, with regard to the conduct of that gallant officer in India. At the battle of Chillianwallah, Lord Burghersh served as aide-de-camp to the Governor General of India. Owing to the great mortality of the officers in the 24th Regiment in that battle, his Lordship immediately gave up his staff appointment for the purpose of joining the 24th until fresh officers were appointed. He joined the 24th in time to serve at the battle of Goojerat, since which he had served with credit in the Crimea. As regarded the general system of appointments, he would refer to the case of Major Addison, who was entirely indebted for his present position upon the staff to his talents, and not to his political influence or family connections. Again, Colonel Cunningham, before his appointment to the Turkish Contingent, had served as assistant quartermaster general to one of the divisions of our army in the East, and was most highly spoken of by the Duke of Cambridge and by Lord Raglan. Hon. Members were accustomed in that House to speak of one another in rather free language, because they had an opportunity of answering such attacks; but he questioned the good taste and the chivalrous feeling of the man who took advantage of a public dinner to heap the utmost obloquy upon individuals who had no means of reply. He would advise the hon. Member for Aylesbury, if he wished to retain the good opinion of his countrymen, to adopt that love of fair play which was the characteristic of Englishmen, and to institute proper inquiries before making these unfounded assertions.

COLONEL KNOX said, he was sorry to say that the present was not the first time that the hon. Member for Aylesbury had made unfair attacks upon gallant officers both of the army and navy. Upon a former occasion he thought proper to traduce the character of a gallant admiral, and his object now was to do the same towards the Commander in Chief. These system of conduct. He begged to tell the hon. Member for Aylesbury that Colonel Cunningham was a personal friend of his, and that there was not a word of truth in his statement with regard to that gallant officer. Yet the hon. Member had the temerity and the impudence to rise in his place—

MR. HADFIELD: Sir, I rise to order. Surely that is language not suitable to this House.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Member has used a word quite unparliamentary.

COLONEL KNOX: I would be sorry to use any expression which may be deemed unparliamentary; but I cannot find language sufficiently strong to reprobate the conduct of the hon. Member for Aylesbury. Still, Sir, I am ready to withdraw any expression which you may consider to be improper; but I really do think that the hon. Member should not, without acquainting himself with the circumstances—to put it in the mildest way—venture to asperse the character and conduct of gallant officers both in the army and navy.

MR. FRENCH said, he would put it to the House whether the discussion as to military promotions ought not to cease. A notice stood in his name on the paper, to the effect that he intended to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what was the opinion of the Government with reference to Lord Dundonald's plan for the destruction of the Russian fortresses, but he had been requested by Lord Dundonald to postpone the question until Monday next, upon which day he would accordingly put it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I cannot but express the deep regret which I feel, and which I am sure is partaken by the majority of this House, at the position in which the hon. Member for Aylesbury has this evening placed himself. Every man is at full liberty—and he does but perform his duty in exercising that liberty—to bring forward against public men any charge in respect to which he feels that he stands on good grounds, and in justification of which he can bring forward proofs which will honestly convince himself and any reasonable man that his charges are founded upon fact. The hon. Member for Aylesbury was, no doubt, perfectly justified in making the charges which he has brought forward against my noble as soon as possible. He must have been misunderstood if he had been reported to say that he contemplated with satisfaction the possibility of a return to protective duties. But he could not dismiss from his mind, if the war continued, that as the burdens of the war increased, as they must do, though the House of Commons, he was satisfied, would do everything to avoid a return to protective duties, yet such would be the difficulties in the choice of objects of taxation that it might be, not a visionary apprehension, but a political necessity, for Parliament to find itself in the inevitable position, from lack of sources, rightly or wrongly to resort to the re-imposition of protective duties. He hoped the day was distant or would never come. He should be sorry to see it; but he could not exclude the impression that such a contingency was not an impossibility.

MR. HEYWORTH said, he feared it was very likely the country would be obliged to return to the imposition of protective duties should war last any length of time.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive.

Clause 7,

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he wished for some explanation as to the difference in the payment of interest.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that with respect to the Consols part of the loan, it was customary to pay the interest on Consols in January and July, and it had been thought advisable to commence the interest from January, so as not to interfere with the customary forms.

Clause 22,

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had great objection to this clause, and would have opposed it earlier had the Bill not been passed through the House with such celerity. He thought the House ought to have an opportunity of considering the question, whether, at the outset of the war, a system ought to be adopted of charging posterity—whatever might be the state of the finances and condition of the country—with the payment of a large sum of interest. When the Report was brought up he should move the rejection of this clause. He would also suggest an addition of certain words in order to make the sense clear.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. and learned Member

had indicated an ambiguity in the clause. It would be found that in the Bill in the hands of the Chairman, words had been introduced to prevent misconstruction with reference to the general policy of the clause; it would not be necessary to occupy the attention of the Committee by going into a discussion of its merits; and as the hon. and learned Gentleman had signified his intention of moving the rejection of the clause when the Report was brought up, he would then state fully the grounds that induced him to propose the clause as it stood. The Committee would, therefore, excuse him if he refrained from entering into the question at that moment.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

CUSTOMS' DUTIES BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he should not be doing his duty as an independent Member if he did not oppose the proposed increased duties on tea, sugar, and coffee. He believed that there was not a cottage in the United Kingdom in which this increased taxation would not be felt most grievously. Considering the high duties to which these articles were already subjected, he looked with alarm on the consequences of the measure proposed. Had the right hon. Gentleman raised 20,000,000*l.* on terminable annuities, and 3,000,000*l.* on Exchequer bills, there would have been no necessity for increasing the duties upon articles of daily and universal consumption. The natural decline of the tea duty had not only been suspended, but an additional duty had also been imposed, and the result of the increase of duty, together with the profit always charged on it by retail dealers, would be, that to those who purchased their tea in small quantities the price would be at least one-third more than at present. With regard to sugar, if the House had formerly stopped at a duty of 1*s.* per cwt. on Muscovado sugar, he thought that would not have been felt as very oppressive, but the duty having been reduced to a maximum of 10*s.* per cwt., all commercial arrangements for the present year had been based on that amount of duty; and the derangement caused to contracts by the ----- Bill would be most serious. He advised that there had been an increase in the importation of sugar, but the profits of those connected with the West Indies had in many instances been scarcely remunerative. With respect to the coffee trade, he knew it to be in a very suffering condition. He should therefore move that the Bill be committed that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. LLOYD DAVIES said, he must express his approbation of the financial measures proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had shown great discrimination in apportioning the various items of additional taxation. Although he felt the greatest sympathy for the lower classes, still he thought it was not fair to exempt one class from direct taxation and throw all the burden of that taxation upon another.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Glasgow, who, as he understood, proposed to raise 20,000,000*l.* by terminable annuities, how he proposed to pay the interest upon them. Any gentleman who could solve that problem would be justly considered a Financial Minister. He found that the objections in the House to any sort of taxation were so inconsistent that they answered one another; but if they were acted up to, there would be no revenue at all. He wished also to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for some information with respect to the increase which was made in the malt tax last year. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated that by a certain increase of the malt duty there would be an addition to the revenue of 1,600,000*l.* He wished to know if that estimate had been realised. He did not like duties on articles of general consumption, but he could not conceive how Government could propose a tax of 150,000*l.* on coffee, whilst, at the same time, they were taking off 190,000*l.* on newspapers. He did not see the necessity for taking off this amount. No one asked was an inconsistent system of taxation, and, in his opinion, a blot upon the financial scheme. He also wished to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amount of tea had been taken out of bond, as he had been informed that large quantities of tea and sugar had been taken out of bond lately. The country was anxious for information upon both questions—how much of the 1,600,000*l.* anticipated by the increased duty on malt imposed last year had been received, and how much tea had been taken out of bond, in anticipation of the increased duties which the Budget imposed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the three articles upon which the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed to levy an additional amount of duty were sugar, malt, and spirits. On sugar and spirits there had not been a diminution, but an increase in the consumption, notwithstanding the additional duty imposed. With regard to the malt tax, the result, so far as it could be at present ascertained, was less favourable. The accounts of the malt duty were in such a state that it was not possible at present to ascertain the result with accuracy, but it did appear that the result was less favourable than it was in the case of sugar and spirits. One cause of its being so was no doubt the high price of barley during the last harvest. The produce of the malt duty had fallen short of the estimate, though the general estimate of his right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had been exceeded on the year to the extent of 1,000,000*l.* As to the remission of the newspaper duty, he thought it had been sufficiently discussed when the Newspaper Stamp Bill was before them. He had argued that the abolition of the compulsory stamp was not a fiscal question, and so regarding it he had not made it part of the Budget. The alteration was proposed on special grounds, and the House had sanctioned his proposal. The hon. Member had likewise asked whether a considerable amount of tea had not been taken out of bond for consumption shortly before the increase in the duty was proposed. A certain quantity had been taken out shortly before the Budget was introduced, but it much regret seeing any system of education attempted in that country the basis of which was not founded upon the principle of the parochial schools, which had been the means of giving to Scotland the great national pre-eminence in education that she had so long enjoyed. He (Mr. Blackburn) did not mean to say those schools were perfect, but he thought nothing could be more distinct than Lord Lansdowne's testimony to the principle on which they were established—that of a connection with the Church. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, the Lord Advocate, who brought in this Bill, had also stated that at present the parochial schools in Scotland were more efficient than they had ever been before, and that they were decidedly more efficient than they were twenty years ago. Another testimony in favour of the existing system might be deduced from the preamble of the right hon. and learned Lord's Bill, which said:—

"And whereas instruction in the principles of religious knowledge and the reading of the Holy Scriptures, as heretofore in use in the parochial and other schools in that country, is consonant to the opinions and religious profession of a great body of the people, while at the same time ordinary secular instruction has been, and should be, available to children of all denominations," &c.

What higher testimony could be borne to the principle of the schools than the admission that for 200 years past they had given exactly the religious teaching that was desired by the great body of the people, and had communicated secular instruction to the children of those who dissented from the Established Church? The great feature of the present Bill was, that it severed the existing connection between the Church of Scotland and the parochial schools, and thereby destroyed the principle which had produced such excellent results up to the present time. Why had this Bill been proposed when it was admitted that the schools had worked so well and had effected so much good? He thought, the true reason had been assigned by the Duke of Argyll, who in 1850 stated in his place in the House of Lords, that the agitation which had been raised for the overthrow of the parochial system was founded in the main on those feelings which all Dissenters bore to all Established Churches, especially to those which they had lately left, and from which they differed least. Now, with regard to the Free Church seceders, very exaggerated statistics, he thought, had been published; but that was of no great importance at the present moment. It was impossible, however, when the presentation of petitions on this subject took place, not to be struck with the frequent repetition of the words "Free Church," the petitions from Free Church presbyteries and synods being so very numerous. He had great respect for the Free Church, and thought the conduct of those 450 ministers, who left their manses and stipends for what they believed to be a great principle, was worthy of all praise; but it did not follow that he thought them right in leaving the Church, and he believed some of themselves were now of the same opinion. Be that as it might, however, the present Bill was directly opposed to their own principles. The protest which they left behind them when they seceded from the Church, and which he believed was drawn up by the hon. and learned Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop), stated that they held by the doctrine of an Established Church and by the principles of the Church of Scotland; but one of the principles of the Church of Scotland was, that there should be connected with it a system of parochial schools. Then, why should they wish the schools to be disconnected from the Church? It was no argument to say it was not the right Church, for those who formed the secession could not be admitted as the judges in such a case. He thought the best thing they could do was to petition Parliament to give the Established Church such relief as would enable the Free Church to join it again. The Bill before the House proposed to transfer the entire management of the schools in Scotland to a Board. He thought the Scotch Members would rather abolish some of the Boards that already existed in Edinburgh than sit in the establishment of a new one. He believed that even the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Cowan) would hardly be in favour of a new Board, though, no doubt, some of his constituents derived considerable advantage from those that already existed. It would be infinitely better that the inspectors should report at once to a Minister in London—say a Minister of Instruction, or, failing a Minister of Instruction, to some one charged with the administration of Scotch business, who would leave the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate time to attend to his important duties, than to have a Board constituted as was proposed by this Bill. The Board was to consist of seventeen persons, of whom eight were to be nominees of t ment, the President of the Educational Institute, four provosts from four large towns, and four representatives from the four Universities of Scotland. Now, last year the test was abolished in the Universities with regard to all the chairs except that of Divinity, so that the professors were not necessarily religious men—they were only philosophers. But the next four members of the Board were not philosophers, but provosts. The provosts of Scotland—analogous to mayors in England—were, no doubt, a respectable body, but they were a most extraordinary class from whom to choose those who were to have the control of the whole education of Scotland. The provosts of the four towns who were to be members of the Board were highly respectable gentlemen; but not one of them dreamed, when elected, of being put to superintend the education of the country. The effect would be, that either the provosts would not be fit to direct the education of Scotland, though they might be excellent provosts, or, if they were selected only for their qualities in regard to education, that they would not be good provosts. Taking the Board as a whole, he believed it to be one of the worst ever constructed, while its powers were absolute and perfectly free from control. It would have the control of the religious education that was to be given, and in all cases the schoolmaster would have to obey its orders. If a clergyman took exception to the religious opinions of a schoolmaster, if, for example, Dr. Candlish and Dr. Cunningham—and he should be sorry at present to mention the one and not the other—should object to the religious views of a schoolmaster, they could do nothing in opposition to the Board. Say that the doctrine of original sin, which was a favourite doctrine with the people of Scotland, was in question. The Board would no doubt reflect the Government views upon that subject, and it so happened that we knew what those views were, for the noble Lord at the head of the Government had stated that all people were born good, and that therefore there was no such thing as original sin in the world. The people of Scotland thought there was nothing so bad as Erastianism. The spirit of Erastianism was subjecting religious questions to the authority of a civil tribunal. Viewed were to be entirely under the orders of this Board. He did not think that, with such powers vested in the Board, respectable people would consent to become members of the school committees. Some vague reasons might be put forward for the proposed change, and among others it might be said that it repealed the test for schoolmasters. The schoolmaster had to give religious instruction, and it was necessary to see whether he had what he was going to teach. There must therefore be some examination into the religious opinions of the schoolmaster. The preamble of the Bill was, that there was to be religious teaching, but where the provision for such teaching was to be found in the Bill he did not know. It would be a mistake to suppose that the people of Scotland thought of religion as a thing set apart from the rest of life, and this examination of the schoolmaster was a qualification, and not a test. Another general accusation was, that the Church of Scotland wanted to monopolise the teaching of the young. But the friends of the Church offered that if the Government would leave these schools alone, they would join the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate in enacting a provision for schools for those places which were destitute at present. The members of the Church of Scotland did not want a monopoly of the whole education of Scotland, but only wished to keep their own schools to themselves. It was equally untrue to say that the parochial schools of Scotland were sectarian. The schools of Scotland never had been sectarian, but they had taught the religion of 95 per cent of the Scottish people, as had been admitted by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate himself. The fact was, it was not what was taught in these schools to which people objected, but those by whom it was taught. The late highly respected Mr. Hume bore testimony to the harmonious working of the system in his youth, and to the absence of distinction between religious sects, and the system had gone on in the same manner ever since. The present President of the Council had expressed an opinion on this subject which had led him to doubt whether this could be a Government measure. Perhaps it was an open question, and they might hear the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) object to it when the Bill went selves approved of, and that these old institutions of the country should be the last object upon which any experiment should be tried. There was one general argument against interfering with these schools, to which he did not wish to attach undue importance, but by the Act of Union the schools of Scotland were secured to the management of the Presbytery. He did not wish to speak of the Act of Union as it resembled the laws of the Medes and Persians, but what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) said the other night of the Act of Uniformity might be said of the Act of Union, that it must be considered a fundamental law, which, without strong necessity, ought not to be changed. Now, had any strong case of necessity been made out in the present instance ? The large towns wanted schools, and it was natural that the borough Members should not like to refuse the right hon. and learned Lord permission to introduce his Bill. They all did so, however, hoping it would be amended. So, to all the petitions presented in favour of the Bill, there was some qualification or other. The petitioners did not like the Bill, but they liked the blow it dealt at the Established Church. Only two public meetings had been held in favour of the Bill, and at one of these—in Edinburgh—they were obliged to cut down the resolutions to nothing at all, and the Lord Provost had to explain that the meeting was one in favour of the Bill, and that those who were opposed to it could not be heard. There had been 117 petitions presented against the Bill, signed by 5,876 persons, while there had only been six petitions and six signatures in favour of the Bill, so that it could hardly be represented that an overwhelming amount of public opinion had been manifested in favour of the Bill. Lord Melgund, in a letter written by him before the Bill was printed, had conjectured that the denominational clause might be excluded from the Bill, although its principle might be continued by a separate system. The denominational clause was apparently excluded from the Bill, and the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had taken credit for leaving it out, but if hon. Members would turn to the 45th Clause they would find what appeared to him to be the denominational clause in another shape. The 45th Clause was as follows—

"It shall be lawful for the Committee of Council to alter or modify, in so far as they may consider it to be proper with reference to the provisions of this Act, any existing Minutes of Her Majesty's most hon. Privy Council in regard to education ; but such Minutes, unless in so far as altered or modified, shall be in no way affected by the passing of this Act."

It appeared to him that the Committee of Privy Council, under colour of this clause, might continue the grants to denominational schools, and he should like to know whether those little Maynooths were to be supported or not by the Government. Were the Presbyterians of the Free Church and Roman Catholics to receive grants from the Privy Council, and was the Established Church to be excluded ? He hoped that the House would consider whether it was advisable to change a system which had acted well for one totally untried, and whether it would not be right, if the Government wished to try a new experiment, to compel them to resort to a new field for the purpose. It appeared by statistical returns that in Glasgow actually 80 per cent of the children between the ages of five and twelve attended school. Could they, then, oblige the remaining 20 per cent to go to school ? That was a difficulty which he feared the right hon. and learned Lord's Bill did not touch. In Edinburgh that 20 per cent would not attend places of instruction, notwithstanding the establishment of ragged schools and the temptation of a dinner given to the scholars, and he believed that nothing but a compulsory measure would make them go to school.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. DUNLOP said, that as the hon. Member had mentioned that according to the last Report only six petitions had been presented in favour of the Bill, he wished to state that last night he presented nineteen and on that day twenty-three petitions in its favour ; and his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate had presented fifty. Last year there were presented to the House 872 petitions with 85,689 signatures generally favourable to a Bill such as the one before the House, and the petitions in a contrary sense had only 42,381 signatures. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Blackburn) said that the Bill had the support of the borough Members only. The fact was, that thirteen county Members voted for the Bill of last year, and fourteen against it, leaving only a majority of one county Member against the Bill. On the other hand, twenty-three borough Members of Scotland supported it, and not one voted against it, so that of Scotch Members there were thirty-six for and fourteen against the Bill of last year. The Members in favour of the Bill represented 66,531 constituents, and those against it 23,878, or three to one, being much in the same proportion as the Members who voted on either side. There could be no doubt, therefore, that the feeling of the people of Scotland was decidedly in favour of the Bill. As they were now discussing the principle of the Bill, he would not follow the hon. Gentleman into all the details he referred to ; but if the hon. Gentleman really believed that it would be so mischievous in its effects, he would scarcely have proposed, as he had done, that the whole town population of Scotland should be subjected to its operation. There were two contending schemes in reference to Scotch education. According to one, the schools would be continued under the control and superintendence of the Church Establishment, and according to the other, which was the scheme of the right hon. and learned Lord's Bill, Scotland would have a national and not a denominational system of education. There were great facilities for establishing a national system in Scotland. Since eight-ninths of the church-going population belonged to Presbyterian bodies, holding the Westminster Confession of Faith, and they with Dissenters agreeing with them absolutely on all questions of religion amounted to nine-tenths of the population. With this general agreement it was desirable to establish a national system of education, instead of maintaining one under the exclusive superintendence of the Established Church. It was a matter of some importance, in discussing the question, whether the Established Church of Scotland should have the exclusive control of the people of that country, to ascertain in what proportion the inhabitants of Scotland adhered to the communion of that Church. Referring to the attendance at Divine worship in Scotland on what was called "Census Sunday," he found that above one-third of that attendance consisted of the members of the Free Church ; and less than one-third of the members of the Established Church, while more than one-third was composed of other denominations. Then let them look at the state of particular counties. Members of the establishment were in a majority in only two counties, and in Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland they numbered not more than one-twentieth of the population. Yet it was proposed that the education of the people should be placed entirely under the control of the establishment, and to be conducted by teachers who should be members of that body. The honour of founding the parochial schools was due to the people of Scotland, who had, at the Reformation, without legal aid, voluntarily assessed themselves in every parish for that purpose, and now that the greater part of Scotland had been driven from the Established Church, they asked that their schools might be restored to them. He would appeal to the generosity and justice of the English Members to support that demand. The votes of English Members in opposition to the wishes of the people of Scotland, re-establishing Church patronage after the Union, and rejecting the claim of right in 1843, had been the sole cause of the existing divisions among Presbyterians in that country, and he called upon them to make some reparation for the evil they had done, and having deprived Scotland of an united Church, not to deny to her a common school.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to state the reasons which prevented him from supporting this Bill. It contained no clause which gave the slightest security to the people of Scotland that the education to be afforded to their children would be religious education ; but, on the contrary, it removed the securities which at present existed. No religious test was to be required from the schoolmaster, who might be a Roman Catholic, or a member of any other religion, or who might have no religion at all ; and it was proposed to remove the supervision of the clergy, and to substitute for it a Board of Education, the majority of which was to consist of nominees of the Government. They all knew that the management of such Board would be in the hands of the chairman and secretary, for whose religious opinions they had no guarantee. The present Bill was an attempt to substitute a secular for a religious system of education, and a question arose whether the English Members would force a system, which they were unwilling to apply in their own case, on the people of Scotland. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had been accused of bringing forward this measure in order to carry out the views of the stitutions of the country should be the last object upon which any experiment should be tried. There was one general argument against interfering with these schools, to which he did not wish to attach undue importance, but by the Act of Union the schools of Scotland were secured to the management of the Presbytery. He did not wish to speak of the Act of Union as it resembled the laws of the Medes and Persians, but what the right hon. There could be no doubt, therefore, that the feeling of the people of Scotland was decidedly in favour of the Bill. As they were now discussing the principle of the Bill, he would not follow the hon. Gentleman into all the details he referred to; but if the hon. Gentleman really believed that it would be so mischievous in its effects, he would scarcely have proposed, as he had done, that the whole town population of Scotland should be subjected to its operation. There were two contending schemes in reference to Scotch education. According to one, the schools would be continued under the control and superintendence of the Church Establishment, and according to the other, which was the scheme of the right hon. and learned Lord's Bill, Scotland would have a national and not a denominational system of education. There were great facilities for establishing a national system in Scotland. Since eight-ninths of the church-going population belonged to Presbyterian bodies, holding the Westminster Confession of Faith, and they with Dissenters agreeing with them absolutely on all questions of religion amounted to nine-tenths of the population. With this general agreement it was desirable to establish a national system of education, instead of maintaining one under the exclusive superintendence of the Established Church. It was a matter of some importance, in discussing the question, whether the Established Church of Scotland should have the exclusive control of the people of that country, to ascertain in what proportion the inhabitants of Scotland adhered to the communion of that Church. Referring to the attendance at Divine worship in Scotland on what was called "Census Sunday," he found that above one-third of that attendance consisted of the members of the Free Church; and less than one-third of the members of particular counties. Members of the establishment were in a majority in only two counties, and in Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland they numbered not more than one-twentieth of the population. Yet it was proposed that the education of the people should be placed entirely under the control of the establishment, and to be conducted by teachers who should be members of that body. The honour of founding the parochial schools was due to the people of Scotland, who had, at the Reformation, without legal aid, voluntarily assessed themselves in every parish for that purpose, and now that the greater part of Scotland had been driven from the Established Church, they asked that their schools might be restored to them. He would appeal to the generosity and justice of the English Members to support that demand. The votes of English Members in opposition to the wishes of the people of Scotland, re-establishing Church patronage after the Union, and rejecting the claim of right in 1843, had been the sole cause of the existing divisions among Presbyterians in that country, and he called upon them to make some reparation for the evil they had done, and having deprived Scotland of an united Church, not to deny to her a common school.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to state the reasons which prevented him from supporting this Bill. It contained no clause which gave the slightest security to the people of Scotland that the education to be afforded to their children would be religious education; but, on the contrary, it removed the securities which at present existed. No religious test was to be required from the schoolmaster, who might be a Roman Catholic, or a member of any other religion, or who might have no religion at all; and it was proposed to remove the supervision of the clergy, and to substitute for it a Board of Education, the majority of which was to consist of nominees of the Government. They all knew that the management of such Board would be in the hands of the chairman and secretary, for whose religious opinions they had no guarantee. The present Bill was an attempt to substitute a secular for a religious system of education, and a question arose whether the English Members would force a system, which they were unwilling to apply in their own case, on the people of Scotland. The

was true that Scotland had taken a lead in the education of her people, but he was far from asserting that in that country education was perfect. From the Report of the Sanitary Commissioners it appeared that the condition of persons employed in the collieries was very bad, and in Glasgow, out of a population of 25,000, it appeared that when that Report was made only 2,368 children were at school. Such being the case, he hoped that the House would not hesitate to pass a Bill which would be productive of great benefit. In 1696 an Act was passed for the education of the people of Scotland, and two subsequent Acts had been passed relating to the same subject, but burghs were excluded from the operation of each of these Acts ; and would the House be now justified in withholding from those burghs a general system of education to which they were entitled ? It was proposed by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that the Established Church, which comprised about one-third of the population of Scotland, should enjoy a monopoly of education, but he questioned the right of any one sect to such a monopoly, and was in favour of the adoption of a general and comprehensive system. The hon. Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. Blackburn) said that it would be better for the Educational Board to sit in London than in Edinburgh, but if such a proceeding were attempted it assuredly would be viewed with the greatest jealousy by the people of Scotland. All parties now strongly desired to see this question settled on a permanent and comprehensive basis, and when its difficulties were fairly grappled with many of them would doubtless disappear. It was to be hoped, therefore, that this measure would receive the support of a large number of the Scotch Members of that House, by whom alone the English Members would do well to leave it to be dealt with in Committee upstairs ; and if the measure were only allowed now to be read a second time it would no doubt soon become popular with the people, for whose benefit it had been framed.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that this measure had been discussed with so much ability by Members on both sides who possessed the advantage of local knowledge in relation to it, and especially at any length on the subject. Still, having been so frequently appealed to in the course of the debate, he wished to explain the grounds of the vote he was about to give. The measure for promoting education in England and Wales that he had recently introduced had been referred to by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate and others as justifying the provisions of this Bill for Scotland. Giving the best attention he could to the measure before the House, he could find nothing in the Bill to justify hon. Members in appealing to him for support on the ground of his own Bill on the subject of education. This Bill was in many of its most important principles in direct opposition to his Bill. Let them compare for a moment the respective contents of the two Bills. One of the most important objects of his Bill was the retention of all existing schools and other educational agencies, whereas the destruction of the present schools was a leading feature of this measure for Scotland. [“No, no !”] This Bill certainly proposed to sweep away the system which had been pursued with so much benefit to Scotland for the last two centuries and upwards. Another of the proposals of his Bill was designed to preserve a distinctive religious character for every school, combined, however, as every national system of education must be, with the completest toleration. Well, but in Scotland there were already schools with a religious character, but the schools which were to supersede them under this Bill were not to possess such an essential characteristic. Again, his measure to maintain the religious character of the schools required the teaching to be of the same denomination as that to which the school belonged. Now, in Scotland they had a test by which they secured the religious qualifications of the teacher; but this Bill sought to repeal that safeguard, and provide no substitute in its place. Here, then, were two broad differences between the measures in question. When, therefore, they were asked to assent to the abolition of the old established system of Scotland, they would naturally inquire whether it had failed or fallen short in the accomplishment of its mission. It was said that the great majority of the people of that country were adverse to the maintenance of the system, but certainly existence, supported by general or local taxation, and chiefly by taxes on land. In addition to these there were also connected with the Established Church 537 other schools; and the aggregate number of scholars in the two classes of schools above enumerated was 125,895. The Free Church had striven to do its duty in the work of education, but its influence, however it might appear to be in the majority, was certainly very limited as compared with that of the Established Church. It possessed only 712 schools, with 62,660 scholars; while in connection with the third denomination—the United Presbyterians—there were but sixty-one schools, with 5,807 scholars. Why, then, should those who were in favour of the extension of national education be required to aid in the demolition of a machinery that had worked so beneficially? What were the main points which he had advocated in bringing forward his scheme for England and Wales? Why, first, that they should establish there a national system of education; but in Scotland they now had such a system in operation. Secondly, he had laid it down that education should be supported by local taxation; but in Scotland education was already maintained in that manner. Thirdly, he had contended that their national system should be religious; but in Scotland that was a characteristic of the existing schools. Fourthly, he had held that the system for England ought to be tolerant in its principle; and in Scotland the schools connected with the Established Church fully recognised the independence of Dissenters. He believed there was no country in the world where the feeling of the Protestant inhabitants was more decided against Roman Catholicism than in Scotland. He found, however, that a considerable proportion of Roman Catholics attended the schools, and it was the practice not to press on Roman Catholic children any doctrines against their own religion. This was the very system he was advocating for England. How, then, could he give his support to this measure consistently with the position he had taken with respect to education in England? He wished for full toleration in England, and he found the system in existence in Scotland based on complete toleration. How could he lend himself to the destruction of such a praiseworthy system?

want of such a system. He was told that the Free Church of Scotland approved of the Bill. But were the people of England likely to adopt a system because the Free Church of Scotland approved of it? They had been lately told that the Free Church clergy had censured those who allowed their children to attend schools not connected with the Free Church. He greatly feared that this Bill would not lead to harmony, and that while it destroyed an efficient system it would substitute nothing equally advantageous in its place. He was reluctant to oppose the Bill as a whole, as there were some parts of which he approved. He really believed that some reasonable change would be agreeable and beneficial to the people of Scotland; but he could not approve of the way in which the Bill was framed. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would bring in a measure to supply appropriate education to rural districts, or to improve existing schools, that measure should have his support; but, as he believed the Bill, as framed, would prove injurious to the people of Scotland, he must give a reluctant vote against it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he must congratulate Scotland upon the fact that it had acquired an interest in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, while he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not shown a more intimate acquaintance with the facts of the case and with the intention of the Bill than he had displayed. The Bill which he proposed had three objects in view—to reform the parish schools, to ascertain the educational wants of the people, and to supply those wants as they arose. Of those three objects, the last, unquestionably, was the most important. It was a great subject of congratulation and encouragement that on the last two of those objects, which were by far the most important, the Scotch Members of every caste were agreed. He had heard no proposal from the other side to supply those wants. He had heard expressions of strong conviction that something must be done, and he had been told in plain terms that if he would only allow the parish schools to remain as they were, hon. Members on that side would be willing to accept the measure. Now, Government had devised a measure for the supply of the wants of the great towns and populous

Why, then, were they to be stopped on the threshold, and the Bill to be thrown out on the second reading? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midhurst (Mr. Walpole) said that it was his (the Lord Advocate's) own fault, asking him why he did not leave the parish schools as they were, and deal solely with the large towns, as to the remedy for which they were all agreed. But he was asked by another class why he did not apply the same reform to the parish schools as he did to the town schools, and why he did not introduce the popular element there. Were there no parties interested in a parish schoolmaster being a proper person but the landholders, who did not send their children to his school? He was told that he was pulling down the parish schools. These complaints from both sides showed that nothing could be further from his wishes or intentions. On the contrary, it was perfectly clear that the Government had done all that the right hon. Member for Midhurst and others proposed should be done; they had dealt separately with the great towns and the parochial schools. If those impediments were always to arise in the way of education—if they found that no concessions would produce conciliatory results—if the landholders were to be for ever deaf to the voice of public opinion and experience, and blind to the course of events, the time might come when it would be the duty of those who had in their hands measures of educational reform entirely and utterly to remodel the system which seemed to be one only of obstruction. He would now state the three reasons why it seemed to him quite impossible to allow things to remain on their present footing. In the first place, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) that no partial or temporary cure need be tried. Reform must be applied upon a comprehensive system, or not at all. The right hon. Gentleman said the voluntary system had failed, and so it had. He also said that the denominational system had placed schools in the rich districts, and left the poor unprovided, and so it had. Unless things were done on a system, they need not be attempted at all. Now, it was utterly impossible to leave the parish schools in their present condition, the whole educational machinery of the country required remodelling, and the Bill was not calculated for a system of patchwork. If they left out the parish schools from its operation they destroyed the whole system, and they would have a machinery far too great for the work to be accomplished. The intention of the Bill was that they should know from year to year where schools were required, and that by a uniform machinery those schools should come into existence. But there was a second practical reason that appeared to him to be conclusive. There were between 700 and 800 Free Church schools in Scotland, all receiving denominational aid from the Committee of Council on Education; and if the parochial schools were to remain on their present footing they must in common fairness all receive such aid. The result was, that where one school would be quite sufficient they were keeping up two, incurring a double expense, and squandering the public money. His object in the present Bill was to supersede the denominational by a more comprehensive system; but it was his belief that if the House were not prepared to adopt a national system on that basis, then the denominational was the only system which could be taken instead. They could not have both the systems, and, therefore, to make the present scheme operative for the towns, and not for the parishes, was impossible. But there was a third reason, and a convincing one. Should they settle the question by bringing in a Bill solely for the great towns? Should they settle the question by leaving the parish schools in their present state? Did any Scotch Member really believe that the constitution of the parish schools could remain as it was? A fresh agitation would soon be got up in favour of the opening of the parish schools, for their constitution was utterly dissonant to common sense. Let them look at the northern districts, where the Census showed that of the people nineteen-twentieths were Free Church, and but one-twentieth Churchmen. Was there any reason for saying that the parish schoolmaster must be a member of the Established Church when nineteen-twentieths of the children would not be allowed to go to school? Now, if the present measure were rejected, it was not because they refused to deal separately with a part of the subject; it was because hon. Gentlemen would not accept a measure which they admitted to be beneficial in two particulars, only because the Bill did not square exactly with the objects they had in view. With reference to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) and the educational measure he proposed, he (the Lord Advocate) would say this much, that the right hon. Gentleman

frankly admitted the main point. If they were legislating for England, he (the Lord Advocate) would admit that there was a great deal in what the right hon. Gentleman had said. But the right hon. Gentleman forgot they were legislating for Scotland—a country which would accept of nothing but a religious education. Accordingly the Government had it in their power to do in Scotland what could not be done elsewhere—they could rely to a very great extent upon the religious feeling of the community. Had he not known that the result of the passing of the Bill he proposed would be that the Bible and Catechism would be taught in the schools just as before, he should not have brought forward the measure. But the opposition of certain Scotch Members rested entirely on the ground that the parochial schools should be left entirely in the hands of teachers belonging to the Established Church. That was not at all in consonance with the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman, who had said that he would respect the feelings of the majority of the people in a district, and support education in accordance with those feelings. Then, if it could be shown that in the parishes of Scotland the religion of a denomination was one way, and the religion of the masses another, the right hon. Gentleman could not refuse to give his assent to the measure. On no ground could hon. Gentlemen oppose vote against the second reading of the Bill excepting this, that they did not wish to see these parochial schools thrown open to all religious classes of the community. The right hon. Gentleman said, that these parochial schools were part of the ecclesiastical establishment of Scotland, and ought to be exclusively confined to the members of that establishment. It was hardly with patience that he could hear hon. Gentlemen opposite assuming to themselves the right of representing the whole Church of Scotland, and all that it had done in past days. He found hon. Gentlemen saying that they had a great respect for the Church of Scotland, although they did not belong to it; and as these parochial schools formed part of the ecclesiastical system, they were of opinion that that system would be entirely destroyed if they admitted any schoolmaster who was not inclined to take the test. It was an extraordinary state of things that these Episcopalians were for keeping out the very men whom originally this test was devised to keep in, its object being to protect all those who held to the Westminster Confession of Faith. But what was it that this Bill was intended to do? Its object was, among other things, to render the parochial schools in Scotland more extensively useful; but one argument which was common to all discussions of this kind had been used on this occasion. It was said, "Look at what these schools have done for Scotland—will you touch these?" He admitted that they had done much for Scotland, but not because they were administered in the best way, nor because the masters were well chosen; but all the good that had been done by them was in spite of a defective system. But one thing which the parochial schools in Scotland had done was this; they showed how much might be accomplished, not by trusting to the voluntary efforts of individuals, but by the State setting itself to the discharge of the duty of educating the people. In spite of a great deal of mismanagement, of a pittance to the schoolmasters absolutely contemptible, of supervision at many times most superficial, of discipline at many times most lax, these schools had done much for Scotland, and he now asked the House to proceed on that principle, and to extend its bounds, to have a national system for the towns as well as for the country, to reform the parish schools, and to create new ones where they were required. The first thing proposed to be done in regard to the parochial schools was to increase the salaries of the masters. In the next place, an allowance was to be made to a schoolmaster who was unfit by infirmity for the due discharge of his duties, or who by reason of long service should be allowed to retire. In the third place, the parish schoolmaster was not to be inducted until he had been examined by an inspector. Was that reform not to be tolerated? He might here mention an instance, showing the necessity of this preliminary inspection. A bequest was made to some parish schools in Scotland under certain regulations, one of which was, that the schoolmasters should undergo an examination previously to their being appointed. In one of the Reports of the inspectors of these schools, he found that when they first examined the masters of these schools, only twenty-four out of eighty passed the examination. In the following year thirty more passed, but a large proportion were unable to pass the examination. With respect to the management of these schools, would not any one believe, from the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that it was proposed to take the management out of the hands of those in whom that management was now vested? But there was nothing of the kind in the Bill. The election of the schoolmaster would remain with the minister and heritors of the parish, and by proposing that it should not be necessary for the schoolmaster to subscribe any test, confession of faith, or formula, it was simply saying that the minister and heritors may elect the best master they could find, whether he belonged to the Established Church or not. He freely admitted that it was proposed to sweep away the test, if they were pleased to call that a qualification. But the best test in his opinion that could be devised, was evidence of the party being a man of intellect, and an honest, able, and competent man for the discharge of the duties confided to him. No doubt, by abolishing the test, it would empower the minister and heritors to appoint a schoolmaster who might or who might not be a member of the Church; and was it not just and right, where the majority of the district held particular religious opinions which prevented them from going to the parish church, that at the parish school their children should have a master who was calculated to give them instruction according to their own opinions? The Established Church in Scotland was still a very influential body, and she might vindicate to herself more influence if she chose; her members, however, did not amount to more than one-third of the population, and nothing was more dangerous to her peace and well-doing than for her to assume the attributes of power without possessing the reality of it. If, however, the members of that Church would listen to advice, though coming from a quarter which they might rather suspect, he did believe that the best thing that could happen for increasing the influence of the Established Church of Scotland was that this Bill should pass. It was impossible to say what heartburnings would arise from the rejection of this measure. He believed that this measure had survived some prejudices, and hoped that it would be attended with more success than that of last year. With regard to the denominational clauses, the effect of passing the Bill would be to do away with denominational grants to Presbyterian congregations. In large towns where there were such large masses of the Catholic population living in ignorance it would be a fair matter for the consideration of the Privy Council whether in such localities it might not be right to continue these grants for their education, but that was left for the decision of the Privy Council. What would be the result of the division he could not foresee, but he hoped the House would assent to the second reading of the Bill. If it did, it would be a victory, not over any denomination, or in favour of one party and against another—it would be a victory over a common enemy, the worst enemy a State could have—a victory purchased with no blood and watered with no tears, carrying desolation to no happy home, but one which would make the heart of the widow and the fatherless rejoice. They would build up for their country what might be truly called "the cheap defence of nations"—a barrier which would hold back the tide of ignorance and crime for years to come.

Mr. WALPOLE said, he thought the learned Lord had founded his speech on one or two transparent fallacies. His argument seemed intended to show that those who resisted measures like this were enemies to reform, and were constantly raising up impediments to education; but was this a fair inference? Nobody knew better than the learned Lord, that since 1696, the Scotch system of education had introduced into that country, according to the language of the Acts of Council, instruction in godliness, in civility, in learning, and in knowledge; that the people of that country had been enabled, by means of that system, to go from the rural districts to the universities, where many of them had been raised to the highest honours, and that all of them had been trained morally and intellectually to a high standard. One out of every seven and a half of the people of Scotland were at present being educated under that system; and, according to Mr. Kay Shuttleworth, one in seven of the population constituted a fair proportion of the people who ought to be receiving education at any one time. The learned Lord Advocate, however, appeared to say that the people of Scotland had got tired of a system under which all this had been hitherto accomplished, and he now desired to alter it completely. How was it, then, that 1,800 heritors entreated the House to extend but not to suppress the present system? How did it happen that out of thirty-two counties in Scotland, nineteen or twenty had expressed their disapprobation of this Bill, while only four had given in their adhesion to it? There was, he believed, a decided feeling throughout the country that the existing system ought not to be subverted, though he agreed that it might be extended and improved. He agreed with those who thought that in the Highlands, the islands, and the larger towns of Scotland, education was not supplied to the extent it ought to be—in the one case because the population was so scattered; in the other, because it was so dense. But where you possessed a system which had succeeded to such an immense extent, why not extend, enlarge, and improve instead of subverting it? It was said that you could not have a system of education applicable to the towns where it was now deficient without having this general scheme, which was to apply to the parishes also. Now, he wanted to know why the ratepayers in the towns might not be required to establish schools there in the same way as the heritors had established their schools in the country? The two might, he thought, be kept distinct, and the parochial system retained in its integrity, while a system of education might be introduced into the towns which would meet the only deficiency that could be alleged to exist at present in Scotland. The learned Lord complained that they wished to retain a useless test, but it should be remembered that the arguments used against tests in England did not in the least apply to Scotland, because, though in that country you had an unfortunate difference of opinion in points of discipline, there existed no difference upon points of doctrine. It was easy, therefore, to apply a test in Scotland which did not militate against the opinion of the people of that country. Indeed, the right hon. and learned Lord himself, only two years ago, when he had to consider this question of tests with reference to professors in the Scotch Universities, had substituted for the then existing test one which required the person who took it to say that he would not directly or indirectly teach or inculcate any opinions opposed to the Divine authority of the Holy Scripture, or to the Westminster Confession of Faith. That test was not complained of, and if adopted in this case also, it would give a guarantee for religious teaching. He thought the measure of the Lord Advocate amounted to a proposition to reform not only what was bad but what was good in the educational system of Scotland. Institutions which had succeeded, as well as those which had failed, were all to be brought under the operation of this reforming project, and they were called upon to imitate those unnatural kindred of old who, under the command of the sorceress, cut up their aged parents in order that they might restore them to health and vigour. He (Mr. Walpole), and those who acted with him, did not oppose this Bill because they disapproved the extension of education in Scotland, or because they objected to improvements of the existing system. He considered it a wise provision to increase the salaries of the schoolmasters, so as to render them more independent and respectable, and to secure to them retiring allowances after they had devoted their best energies to the instruction of youth. He also thought they ought to endeavour to extend the educational system to those places where a deficiency of educational means existed, and, above all, that they ought, if possible, to establish reformatory schools in Scotland and elsewhere. In his opinion, however, the cost of maintaining such reformatory schools ought not to be thrown upon the local rates, but ought to be provided for out of the general funds of the State, the object being, undoubtedly, to effect a national good. Acquiescing in many of the objects of this Bill, he (Mr. Walpole) must yet entreat the Lord Advocate to divide it into two parts, in order that those provisions upon which all were agreed might at once be adopted. The differences and animosities which existed in Scotland would not be healed by taking away what of right belonged to one, and giving it to another; but such a course would rather tend to aggravate those differences and increase those animosities. If the Bill had been confined to the object of supplying the deficiency of educational means in Scotland, instead of endeavouring to subvert a system which had been unquestionably successful, he would not have offered any opposition to it; but he could not accept the total subversion of a system which he believed, from all he had heard, from all he had seen, and from all he had read, had done more for the moral and religious instruction of the people of Scotland than any other system ever established in any nation of the world.

MR. HADFIELD said, that no provision having been made in the Bill for the Roman Catholics, who were one-fifth of the population of Scotland, they were virtually excluded, and that exclusion he contended was fatal to the measure. He would advise the House to allow the people of Scotland to educate themselves, and they would do it cheaper and better than it would be done under this Bill, which he thought was altogether unnecessary, and which he believed would injure the cause of education in Scotland. He should therefore give it his decided opposition.

Bill read 2<sup>d</sup>, and committed for Thursday, 10th May.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.
Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Bill recommitted.
MR. SCHOLEFIELD moved to leave out the last proviso of Clause 39, which was to the following effect—

"Provided also, that no exemption from stamp duty, other than such as is contained in section 8 of the Act passed in the Session of Parliament held in the 6th and 7th years of the reign of His Majesty King William IV., chap. 82, shall extend to any Benefit Building Society."

MR. WILSON said, it was never intended that the exemption from stamp duties should extend to building societies. It was at first represented that these societies were of great use to the poor, but they were now converted into large speculations for builders and capitalists, and the indirect effect of this exemption was, to defraud the revenue of considerable sums from year to year.

MR. ATHERTON said, he saw no necessity for this proviso, which was an exception foreign to the enactment upon which it was engrafted.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 26: Majority 11.

Clause agreed to; as were also the remaining clauses.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON proposed a new clause, authorising, in consequence of the increased risk of death in the case of militiamen serving abroad, that friendly societies should be authorised to increase the periodical payments from men so serving abroad.

MR. COWPER said, he must oppose the clause. He thought that if the militiamen went to the stations abroad they were likely to live longer than if they stayed at home. At all events, the friendly societies should be left to make their own rules.

MR. SPOONER said, he agreed that friendly societies should be left to make their own rules; but Parliament had prevented that, by compelling them to retain as members men who enrolled in the militia, and who formerly, by that very circumstance, lost their right of membership.

MR. SOTHERON said, he would suggest that the clause should be postponed, in order that it might be further considered.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, his

1935                  Supplies                  {LORDS}                  to the                  1936

noble Friend (Viscount Ebrington) wanted to protect the societies, but he thought the militiamen were also entitled to protection. When the militia was raised by voluntary enlistment two years ago, the friendly societies had taken advantage of the words of the Act, by which they were then regulated, to strike off the men who enlisted into the militia; and a clause to prevent them so doing was inserted in a subsequent Act. His noble Friend thought the condition of the militiamen was altered by their volunteering for foreign service, but they only volunteered to do garrison duty in the Mediterranean stations, not to do duty at the seat of war or in the West Indies, and, therefore, they ran no greater risk as to life or health than if they remained at home. He hoped his noble Friend would not press the clause.

MR. HENLEY said, he would suggest the postponement of the clause. He doubted whether the chances of health were as good in the places named by the noble Lord as at home, and he, therefore, hoped some time would be given for considering the proposal contained in this clause.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he was aware of the case of an assurance office, which would not insure the life of a militiaman, who was liable to be called upon to serve in the tropics or at the seat of war, without his paying an additional premium. Why, then, should the same power be refused to a friendly society, which, if properly managed, should be regulated upon the same principles as an assurance office?

The House resumed.

The House adjourned at Two o'clock till Monday next.

MINUTE.] PUBLIC BILL.—3<sup>a</sup> Militia.

GENT.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he wished to call the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the War Department to a statement that had appeared on Saturday, in a letter dated the 22nd of the month, from Genoa. That statement was to the effect that two of the largest vessels, the Cresus and the Nubia, had been laden with provisions for the Sardinian troops, in consequence of the Commissary General in the Crimea having declared himself unable to fulfil the engagement that the Sardinian troops should be supplied with provisions by the British Commissariat. He was of opinion that, unless there was some military convention of which they had no knowledge to supply the Sardinian troops from the British Commissariat, that duty was not imposed on them. The obligation we had undertaken was, to secure and facilitate the supply of provisions to the Sardinian army; but he apprehended that such securing and facilitating the supply of provisions to the Sardinian army would be effected by giving to the Sardinian Government the use and advantage of the transports at our disposal. It was desirable that their Lordships should have information as to what steps had been taken to carry out the provisions of the convention. With regard to the alleged inability of the Commissary General in the Crimea to fulfil the condition—supposing it existed—of supplying the Sardinian troops from the British Commissariat, he could not think it possible that that could be the case. He thought it was impossible, because the convention was dated the 26th January, and of course it must have been known for a long time before that it was in contemplation; and he presumed that the Minister of War had given immediate information to the Commissary General, with directions to take care to obtain a sufficiency of provisions for the additional troops. Difficulty there was none in providing a sufficiency of food at Balaklava for the use of the troops. A single ship of 1,000 tons would convey provisions for twenty-two days for 40,000 men, and four times that amount of tonnage would so continue that supply, that the army would have always at its disposal twenty-two days' provisions, besides what was contained in its magazines. Therefore, considering the amount of tonnage at the command of the Government, he thought there could be no difficulty in complying with that requisition at Balaklava. There was no doubt that the demands on the Commissariat had largely increased since October. In that month there was probably about 30,000 rations required; and notwithstanding all the losses the army had sustained, yet, taking into consideration the large drafts that had been sent out from this country to several regiments, and the large number of additional regiments already sent out, as well as the ten regiments that were to be sent from the Mediterranean when they were relieved, and also considering that a number of men were to be provisioned by the Commissariat, who were employed and would be employed in the land transport corps, he could not but think that at present there was a demand for 40,000 rations. They would besides have a new demand in a few weeks for rations for 20,000 troops of the Turkish levy, and there was also a further demand coming upon them for 4,000 rations on account of General Beatson's corps of cavalry, and for rations for the followers necessarily attached to these troops. There would be also a new demand for rations for about 10,000 men of the reserve stationed at Malta, so that, instead of there being only a demand, as in October, for 30,000 rations, the demand could not be less than for 70,000 or 80,000 rations. Difficulty there could be none in supplying the troops near Balaklava; and in the ordinary state of the roads there would be no difficulty in carrying up to the lines a sufficiency of food to be used by the troops. 450 or 500 animals would be perfectly capable of carrying up all the rations for 40,000 men every day. As the men had hitherto been fed from hand to mouth, he presumed it was intended they would continue to be fed in the same way, and, therefore, 450 or 500 animals would be sufficient. But the case would be different when the army moved into the field. When it moved into the field 10,000 mules would be required to carry provisions, and as they required 4,000 persons to lead them and look after them, they would also require 4,000 more rations. For these 10,000 mules they would require forage, which, in a country like that, must be carried also. And the further the army went from the coast the greater number of mules would be required, to return empty and keep up the supply by bringing back to the army fresh provisions. Therefore, if the Commissary General said it would be impossible for him to supply the army in the field with provisions, that would be probably the fact, because the question of land transport would be involved in it; but the only question that had been put to the Commissary General was, whether he could supply food or not to the Sardinian troops at Balaklava; and he (the Earl of Ellenborough) thought it was impossible that he should have said he could not. When he thus referred to the great demand on the resources of the Commissariat—to which he had also referred on former occasions, but with little success—he must at the same time press upon the noble Lord the Minister of War the necessity of providing persons, without taking them from the ranks of the army, for the purpose of acting in various situations under the Commissariat, and in the various situations in which men were required to act with an army. As the army then stood, or lately stood, he learned, not only from information he had himself, but from what he had gathered from the information contained in the public journals, that 4,000 troops were detached for Commissariat purposes; and if they sustained a loss of 4,000 men in consequence of the number required for those purposes, and if they did not otherwise provide for the execution of the duty, by the extension of the force now taking place, they would be reducing to a very serious, dangerous, and painful extent, the ranks of the army, which they must again fill up; but no matter what provision they might make for that purpose, if they could not obtain men it would be impossible for them to carry on the war with success. He wished to know whether there was any convention in furtherance of the objects of the clause in the Military Convention with Sardinia for the purpose of specifying what France and England were to do with the view of securing and facilitating the provisioning and maintenance of the Sardinian troops, and whether the Commissary General in the Crimea had been applied to, to supply those troops, and had replied that he was unable to do so?

Lord PANMURE, in reply to the first question of the noble Earl, had to state that he had heard with considerable surprise what had been stated with regard to the Croesus, one of the most important vessels in the transport service, and which had been intended to convey Sardinian troops to the Crimea. He did not say that the ship went to be laden with provisions, but he did expect that provisions would have been sent for the maintenance of the Sardinian troops. The understanding between the two Governments was, that, in the first instance, the Sardinian Government should send forth an army accompanied by one month's provisions for the maintenance of that army. There was no further convention between the two Governments; but there was an understanding with reference to the Sardinian army, that, to avoid contention in the market, provisions should be supplied to it from the British Commissariat, which were to be paid for by the Sardinian Government, and the Commissariat Department of the British army had been charged to furnish magazines able to answer the demands for rations made by the Sardinian troops. What was received by those troops would be paid for, and an intimation to that effect had a considerable time ago been sent to the Commander in Chief of the British army in the Crimea. It was quite true that Mr. Fildes, in the first instance, expressed some doubt as to procuring supplies; but neither Lord Raglan nor Mr. Fildes had ever expressed any doubt that, with sufficient means at their disposal, they could fully and efficiently supply the necessities of the army. He was satisfied, from information which he had received by the last mail from Sir John M'Neil, who had been sent out to inquire into the efficiency of the Commissariat, that that gentleman was convinced, from the facts before him and his experience in that country, that ample supplies of meat and grain were to be found there, and that there was at this moment at the disposal of the Commissary General sufficient for the maintenance of any number of troops which it could fall to his lot to have to supply. He thought that this answered two of the questions which the noble Earl had put. With reference to the other point—namely, the increasing demand upon the Commissariat, he might state that the Commissary General of the army in the Crimea would not be called upon to supply the Turkish Contingent or the troops forming under General Beatson. Those forces would be supplied from other sources, and not from any means at Mr. Fildes's command. With regard to what the noble Earl had stated respecting the large number of men detached on commissariat duty, the attention of Lord Raglan continued to be directed to the importance of reducing as much as possible the number of persons employed in administering to the wants of the army from the ranks of the army itself. The question appeared to resolve itself into this—whether, when an army was called upon to advance into the interior of a country, or was employed as the British army was at present employed in the Crimea, it was desirable to take from the ranks of the army a certain number of men to perform these services, or to add to the non-combatant ranks of the army individuals who should do that work for them, as was the case in the Indian army? No doubt there were evils in both systems. A practical soldier might say that the manner in which the service was performed in the Queen's army was attended with less inconvenience than resulted from the plan adopted in the Company's army. For himself, he thought that whenever the services of civilians could be employed they ought to be; and he was happy to state that at this moment the whole duty of the camp, which would fall naturally upon the pioneers, was entirely in the charge of civilians, and that for that purpose, therefore, no troops were detached from the ranks. Whenever the army began to move he feared that it would be necessary to continue to observe the practice which at present obtained in the British army, of course always taking care that no men should be detached from the ranks whose services were necessary in other situations. However, when the army moved, he was afraid that it would be necessary to detach men from the ranks, instead of the army being accompanied by a large number of men for the purpose of performing these duties, which might be attended with much inconvenience, and these parties might fall into the habit of plundering the country.

MILITIA (IRELAND) BILL.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to Order).

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, he was anxious that their Lordships should give a little more attention to this measure than they had yet bestowed on it. Upon the two former occasions when it had come before the House very little had been said upon the subject, and it had been read a second time before he had had an opportunity of seeing it. Considerable interest, however, existed in Ireland with reference to it, and he had been requested to take steps with the view of rescuing Irish officers of militia from the evils to which the Bill subjected them. By the Act of Geo III., to which the present Bill referred, certain property qualifications were required for militia officers in Ireland, which were much higher than those required from officers of a corresponding rank in England. He believed that very few persons in Ireland who were in the habit of signing militia commissions, and of certifying to the possession of certain qualifications by militia officers, were really aware what those qualifications were. He had been a colonel of militia so long ago as 1810, and he was ashamed to say

that until he had looked into the provisions of the proposed measure he had not been aware of the qualification necessary. Their Lordships would be surprised to hear how different the qualification was in the three countries. He found, upon investigation, that the qualification for a colonel of militia in Ireland was to be in possession of 2,000*l.* a year, or to be heir apparent to 3,000*l.* a year; while in England it was to be in possession of 1,000*l.* a year, or to be heir apparent to 1,000*l.* a year; and in Scotland it was to be in possession of 600*l.* a year, or to be heir apparent to a similar amount. The qualification for a lieutenant-colonel in Ireland was to be in possession of 1,200*l.* a year, or to be heir apparent to 1,800*l.*; while in England and Scotland it was respectively to be in possession of, or to be heir apparent to, 600*l.* and 400*l.* a year. The qualification for a major in England was 400*l.*, or heir apparent to the same; in Scotland, 300*l.* a year, or heir apparent to the same; in Ireland 300*l.* a year, or heir apparent to 600*l.* The qualification in England for a captain was 200*l.*, or heir apparent for the same; in Scotland, 200*l.* a year, or heir apparent for the same; in Ireland, 200*l.* a year, or heir apparent to 400*l.* a year. The same discrepancy was observable throughout the inferior grades of the service, and he was at a loss to understand upon what grounds it was that militia officers in Ireland should be required to possess so much higher qualifications than were required in the case of English and Scotch officers of the same rank. He proposed that the qualification should be the same as in England and Scotland; for he was convinced that unless a provision of that kind were introduced, the consequences would be very disagreeable. He had no objection to their making any regulations with regard to those officers who might be newly appointed, but he was most anxious that the rights of those whose appointments were not of recent date should be preserved. Many officers had been put to an enormous expense in order to render themselves available for immediate duty, and he thought it was extremely hard that those officers who had shown such laudable zeal for the service of their country should now be called upon to lodge a qualification which he believed a large proportion of them would be unable to do. There was another arrangement which, in his opinion, was very objectionable. Many officers of the Irish militia who had now joined their regiments were of old standing, and had served during the last war, or between that period and the present year. Their Lordships were aware that in consequence of the great distress which had prevailed in Ireland a vast change of property had taken place under the Encumbered Estates Act, and he himself knew captains, and, he believed, field officers, in the militia, who, at the time they obtained their commissions, were perfectly qualified under the Act, but who, in consequence of having been obliged, through the pressure of the times, to part with the whole or a large portion of their property, would not be qualified. He begged to propose two amendments—the first with a view to reduce the qualification of officers in the Irish militia to the same amount as that of officers in the English and Scotch militia; and the second, to enable any officer who was qualified under the Act to make a return of the qualification which he possessed at the time he received his appointment.

Lord PANMURE said, that from the speech of the noble Earl one would suppose that the principle of the Bill was to impose pains and penalties upon officers of the Irish militia, whereas it was of a protective character, and there was nothing whatever in its provision to alter the qualification of officers on their admission to a regiment, or the penalties to which officers were liable who obtained appointments without being duly qualified. When the Irish militia was embodied it was found that during the time it had existed in its disembodied state, officers had been appointed without reference to any consideration of qualification, and that they had entirely overlooked the provisions of the law, which required them to register their qualification at the time they took up their commissions. The object of the present act was to protect the officers from the penalties which such an oversight had subjected them to. He did not believe that more than one case of prosecution had been or would be instituted against any officer, but it was absolutely necessary to protect them from those penalties to which they had subjected themselves, and it was proposed to do that by giving them three months in which to register their qualification. It was not proposed to alter the qualification itself. He was free to admit, however, that the difference in the qualification in Ireland, and in England and Scotland, seemed to him to stand upon no substantial ground, and, if their Lordships did not see any objection in point of law, he did not see any objection in point of principle to put the three countries upon exactly the same footing. That, however, might be done by another Bill, the principle of the present measure being merely to give the officers protection against the penalties consequent upon their having omitted the requirements of the law as it stood.

Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

TRANSPORT OF TROOPS—THE "ALMA."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY rose to put a question to the Secretary for War, of which he had given notice, relative to the embarkation of troops on board of the Alma. The statements which had been current respecting this vessel and the troops which were to go in her, required some explanation. Their Lordships might have seen in the papers a statement to the effect that on Monday the 2nd April an order was issued for a detachment of the Guards to embark on the following Wednesday, at Liverpool, on board the Alma; that on Tuesday the 3rd a counter-order was issued that they were to embark on Good Friday at Portsmouth; and that several orders and counter-orders were issued subsequently. It was stated that the first delay was in consequence of the ship not being able to receive the troops; for when they arrived at the place named for embarkation, they found that she was full of other troops. It was said that detachments of other regiments and some companies of Highlanders were landed from the vessel; but still there was not room for the Guards, and the greatest difficulty was experienced in getting the baggage on board, and some of the baggage of the Guards was reported to have sailed in the ship, while the Guards themselves were left behind. From the information which he had received, he believed that the first order for the Guards was received on the 7th of April to march on the 9th. On the 8th, between seven and eight o'clock at night, a counter-order was received, and in consequence the march ordered for the 9th was suspended. On the 9th there was a new order, and this was suspended on the 10th, at nine o'clock in the evening. On the 11th, they were ordered at nine o'clock in the evening to march on the next day. When they arrived at Portsmouth they found that nothing had been prepared for them, and they were kept there without rations till six o'clock in the evening. All that had taken place in the House of Commons on the subject was an attempt to shift the responsibility from one to the other of the departments. He desired to hear from the Secretary for War on whom the blame of all this vacillation and great want of ordinary precaution should fall. This he regretted was not a solitary instance of remissness and mal-administration. There was another matter bearing on this question, the neglect in respect to which might lead to very serious consequences. These troops were embarked in their old clothing, without any sufficient provision for the summer months, and without the new clothing, which at this season should be supplied to them. They were also sent with the old regimental musket, and without that invaluable and indispensable arm, the Minié rifle. All this showed great neglect on the part of the officials whose duty it was to look to these matters. He, therefore, wished to ask the noble Lord whether these statements were correct; and, if so, what possible defence there could be, after the vast efforts made by the country to provide sufficient means to equip the army, for allowing these things to occur?

LORD PANMURE thought their Lordships had, in the present instance, a very good proof that questions might be put and statements made to which it was impossible to give an answer on the spur of the moment, but by which very erroneous and false impressions might be created on the minds of the public with respect to the conduct of the public departments. The notice of the noble Marquess on the paper was "to put a question to Her Majesty's Government with regard to the embarkation of troops on board the Alma for the East." It was quite impossible for him (Lord Panmure) to know, from the terms of this notice, that the noble Marquess was about to enter into details of which to that moment he (Lord Panmure) had never even heard. The noble Marquess had said that great delay and hesitation had occurred with regard to the embarkation of the troops on board the Alma in consequence of the different orders that were issued. The only order that he knew of, with regard to the delay in the embarkation of those troops, was one to suspend the first order; and the reason for issuing that was, that the ship Alma had left Liverpool without having gone through the forms of attestation as to her efficiency for carrying such a number of troops. The noble Marquess had further said that, when the Guards arrived at Portsmouth, they were detained and kept without rations until they were put on board the Alma. He (Lord Panmure) had never heard any statement to that effect, either from the officers of the Guards or from any military department. But he must say that, after the orders for the embarkation of the troops had been given, whatever delay might have taken place in the embarkation of those troops must be referred to the Quartermaster General's department. In respect to the description of arms with which the troops had been supplied, he certainly never had heard whether there was any ground or not for the report that had been made. He could not, however, believe it possible that it could be true that any detachment of Her Majesty's troops had left this country armed with the old musket. The noble Marquess knew something of military affairs, and he ought to know, and must know, that the whole army now serving in the Crimea had been provided with rifle arms. With regard to the clothing of the detachment of the Guards, he believed they were embarked with a suit of clothing which had been for some time worn; but the Guards were supplied with two suits, and it was the old suit in which they embarked, the second suit having to be supplied to them, and which was not supplied to the regimental troops.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, the noble Lord had not answered the question put to him—whether the Alma was full of other troops, and that it was necessary to disembark some of the troops to put the Guards in, and whether some of the Guards' baggage had not been sent on while the men were left behind?

Lord PANMURE said, it was not true that the Alma was full of troops. There was a detachment of troops on board, which was to accompany the Guards in the Alma, but the ship was not full. The reasons why the Guards were not embarked were sanitary reasons.

LORD WYNFORD could scarcely reconcile the statements which had been made on the other side, because the Alma was lying in the middle of the harbour for several days. How was it that she was waiting so long? Was it for a certificate from Liverpool to enable her to carry these troops? As to the second part of the question, he was aware that a very large portion of troops was put on board, and he himself saw the 50th Regiment disembark. They were in the greatest confusion because they could not get their baggage from the ship. Happening to be on the spot, he was practically convinced that there had been some very great mismanagement as to the arrangements for embarking these troops.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE was very sorry to say that he thought the statements made by his noble Friend near him (the Marquess of Salisbury) were correct. He believed it was true that the Guards left this country with smooth-bore arms, and the only way he could explain that was, that the men would, on arriving at Constantinople or at Balaklava, receive the arms there in store, which he believed were the Minié rifle; but virtually the men had left this country for the seat of war without receiving the Minié rifle. With regard to the embarkation of the troops, he certainly thought it was most unfortunate to all concerned, but particularly to the troops, who would experience many discomforts. As regarded his own regiment, he understood that a large quantity of clothing, consisting of 800 pairs of shoes, and 500 pairs of trousers, had been sent down to be shipped with the men, but when the clothing arrived no room could be found in the ship, and consequently it was left upon the beach. He wished to remind his noble Friend (Lord Panmure) that this was not a desirable thing, as shoes were in time of war a most important article, and he understood a month would elapse before they could be sent out to the men. He had thought it right to bring his noble Friend's attention to these matters. He could not help thinking that very great mismanagement had, with regard to the embarkation of these troops, occurred.

LORD PANMURE was very glad this subject had been discussed, for the more all these matters were brought before their Lordships and the public, the better chance would the heads of the departments have of hearing of them. With reference to the clothing, he was perfectly well aware that a certain quantity was sent down to Southampton, but left behind, and he had had to express his opinion of the conduct of those who were engaged in the transaction. He believed, however, that the clothing would arrive at the Crimea very shortly after the troops reached there. He had heard that the Alma had arrived at, and had left, Malta, and that, so far as the troops were concerned, they arrived there with the loss of only two men out of 1,058; all the rest were safe and in good health.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that perhaps the noble Lord would allow him to put his questions again on Thursday next.

THE WAR—STATE OF THE NEGOTIATIONS.

THE EARL OF DERBY: If I knew to which Member of the Government to address myself, I should be glad of an opportunity of putting a question of considerable importance, inasmuch as we have arrived at a period in this eventful struggle when it is essential that Her Majesty's Government should lay before Parliament and the country the fullest information as to the existing state of affairs. We have forbore, for a long period, to put any question to the Government which might, in the slightest degree, have embarrassed them during the late negotiations; but, inasmuch as we have been given to understand that these negotiations at Vienna have altogether terminated—that all hopes of peace are now at an end—and that Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary has returned to this country—we certainly did expect that the Government would have felt it their duty, without question from any noble Lord on this side of the House, to make a statement in both Houses of the actual state of affairs—the nature of the propositions which have been made, and the nature of the replies given to them—the result of the propositions, and why they were refused. I do not see the noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon) in his place.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My noble Friend has been summoned within the last quarter of an hour to attend Her Majesty.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I wish to ask whether it is the intention of the Government to make a statement of the present posture of affairs and of the negotiations which have taken place—of the statements which have been made, and the language held both by the Allied Powers and by Austria, as well as the character of the answers given by Russia. I wish to ask whether it is the intention of the Government to lay before both Houses the various protocols, and whether, in short, we shall have a statement of the views of the Government as to our present national position in the very critical state of foreign affairs, and the threatening aspect of the peace of the world?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My noble Friend, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has been in the House until within the last five minutes, when he was sent for to attend Her Majesty, and he is now in attendance upon Her Majesty. Had he been here, he would, my Lords, have been prepared to give an answer to the questions which have been put by the noble Earl opposite; but I may say that it is the intention of the Government, at the earliest possible period, to lay a full account of what has taken place before Parliament. No doubt a full account will be given, though I am not prepared to state the exact day; but perhaps to-morrow my noble Friend will be able to name a day.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

TELEGRAPHIC NEWS FROM THE CRIMEA —QUESTION.

MR. WARNER: Sir, as the First Lord of the Treasury is not in his place, I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether telegraphic communication has been established between the Crimea and any part of the Turkish coast and its principalities; and, if so, what is the date of the latest despatch received from the seat of war? I wish also to ask another question, which I hope will be answered to-night—namely, whether any communication has been received from any source whatever relating to the raising of the siege of Sebastopol?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, in answer to the questions of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that the telegraph is, we believe, complete, except across the Danube. I stated to the House, a few evenings ago, that the telegraph had been laid across from the Crimea to the Turkish coast. I believe now that it is complete from the Turkish coast to Rustchuk, and on the other side from Giurgevo to Bucharest. I do not know, however, whether it has yet been laid across the Danube. The last despatch received from the seat of war was received to-day from Lord Raglan, and is dated yesterday. There was no news whatever of any kind as to the raising of the siege of Sebastopol, in which, indeed, I do not believe. There is no communication whatever upon that subject further than a statement of the temporary discontinuance of the fire upon Sebastopol.

MR. GROGAN said, he would beg to ask, if it was the intention of the Government to communicate to the House any news which might be received upon a subject in which the public were so deeply interested?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Anything will be communicated which is of sufficient interest to render it desirable. I was about to say, that when a telegraphic despatch mentioned anything of sufficient interest to render it necessary, desirable, or interesting, to communicate it to the House, I have not the slightest doubt my noble Friend at the head of the Government would do so. After the contemptuous cheer of the hon. Gentleman opposite, I have no objection to state the whole purport of the despatch received to-day. Lord Raglan acknowledges the receipt of a despatch from Lord Panmure, and asks when the Sardinian contingent is to sail.

PAPER MANUFACTORY AT WOOLWICH —QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON said, he begged to ask the hon. Gentleman the Clerk to the Ordnance, whether it is contemplated by the Board of Ordnance to erect a paper manufactory at Woolwich, and for what purpose such an expenditure of the public money is proposed?

MR. MONSELL said, it was the intention of the Board of Ordnance to erect a paper manufactory at Woolwich. Hon. Gentlemen were aware that it had been always the custom to make up cartridges at Woolwich of paper which was cut in the Royal Laboratory, and twisted there by boys. It had been thought, on account of certain inequalities in the size of the paper, that the accuracy of aim with the Minie rifle had been disturbed, and at the same time the Board of Ordnance heard of the invention of Mr. Pirie, of Aberdeen, relating to the manufacture of seamless cartridges from pulp. By means of this machinery, seamless cartridges could be made with great exactness at a much less cost than the seamed cartridges formerly made, and therefore it was determined to introduce that machinery at Woolwich. Hon. Gentlemen might ask why the inventor of that machinery could not have supplied the cartridges without Government erecting the factory. It was absolutely necessary to prevent the cartridges from being crushed in the process of their transmission to the place where they were to be filled with powder, and therefore the expense of carriage from Aberdeen would have been considerably more during the year than the whole expense of the machinery.

INCOME TAX ON CIVIL SERVANTS— QUESTION.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it was his intention to make any exception with respect to the income tax chargeable upon the salaries of the civil servants, who are subjected to a charge of 5 per cent in addition to the present income tax (nearly 6 per cent), making together about 11 per centum levied on their limited incomes; also, whether he was prepared to state on what day he will lay on the table of the House the proposed Bill for altering and amending the law respecting the Civil Service Superannuation Fund?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the income tax included persons holding public offices, employments, and profits under the Crown; also persons holding offices paid from local rates, or under municipal bodies, as well as officers in the navy and army. Besides these, there were the civil servants of the Crown, whose salaries were subject to annual deductions on account of the Superannuation Fund. Those appointed since the Superannuation Act passed were not subject to the income tax. With respect to those who had taken office subsequent to the passing of that Act, Government were not prepared to make any exemption, inasmuch as if they did so they would soon find it necessary, on the ground of equity, to extend a similar exemption to other classes of public officers under schedule B. With respect to the latter part of the question, the subject was under consideration, but he was not prepared to lay on the table any measure regarding it.

SALARIES OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES—QUESTION.

MR. LOWE said, he was desirous of putting a question to his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, but before doing so he wished to state a fact in order to render the question intelligible. By Act of Parliament the salaries of County Court Judges must be, at least, 1,200*l.* a year, and a power was given to raise them to 1,500*l.* in certain cases. Under this Act several of the Judges were receiving 1,500*l.* a year, others 1,300*l.*, and others 1,200*l.* a year. He wished to ask his hon. Friend if the Government had any intention of taking steps to equalise the salaries paid?

MR. WILSON said, the question alluded to by his hon. Friend had, for the last two years, received great attention on the part of Government, and after the most careful consideration Government last year thought themselves justified, considering the great duties performed by some of the Judges, in raising their salaries to the highest point allowed by the Act of Parliament. In supplying these increased salaries, the whole of the funds placed at the disposal of Government had been exhausted. Applications had been received from other Judges for an increase, but he saw no reason for complying with their request, and even if there was one, there were no funds which might be made available.

THE VIENNA CONFERENCES.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, seeing the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonial Department once more among us, I take the liberty of inquiring whether it is the intention of the noble Lord to lay any papers upon the table with respect to his late mission, or to make any statement to the House with regard to it, and, if so, when? And whether it is his intention, by any other means, to afford the House any information as to the proceedings of the last two months at Vienna? I should be glad to hear from the Government what their intentions are on this subject.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, before my noble Friend replies to the question, I wish to correct an answer I gave to the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) the other evening in reply to his question whether the Russian Plenipotentiaries had made any counter proposals to the Conference after the rejection of the proposals made by the English and French Plenipotentiaries. I then answered from a telegraphic message, and such messages, the House is aware, are generally rather short; but from despatches subsequently received, it appears that counter proposals were made by the Russian Plenipotentiaries: those counter proposals, however, were not deemed either by the British, the French, the Austrian, or the Turkish Plenipotentiaries, as calculated to produce a satisfactory conclusion of the question in dispute.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In reply, Sir, to the questions which have been put to me by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), I have to state, in the first place, that I do not think it is for me to decide what papers shall be laid upon the table of the House. I may say, however, that I believe Her Majesty's Government intend very shortly to lay upon the table the protocols of the conferences which have taken place at Vienna. Those protocols will convey to the House information of the substance of the negotiations that have taken place. Perhaps I may say a few words more, without intending to go into any detail as to the negotiations. The first meeting of the Conference was on the 15th of March. The negotiations with respect to the first two of the four points with which the House is acquainted lasted until the 26th of that month. On the 26th of March the third point came under consideration. It was suggested by the Plenipotentiaries of Austria that the Plenipotentiaries of Russia should themselves make a proposal calculated to satisfy the demands of Russia and the exigencies of the case. The Plenipotentiaries of Russia replied that they had no instructions to do so, but they asked for time to refer to their Government. The consequence was that the Conference was then adjourned, and that no meeting for the transaction of business took place until the answer was received from St. Petersburg. On the 17th of April another conference was held, when the Plenipotentiaries of Russia informed the Conference that they had received instructions from their Government not to take the initiative of any propositions, but that they were ready to hear and discuss any proposal which might be submitted to the Conference. The Representatives of the allied Powers then requested forty-eight hours to consider the form in which they should make their proposal, and on the 19th of April the Plenipotentiaries of France and of Great Britain, supported by the Plenipotentiaries of Austria, laid their proposition before the Conference. The Russian Plenipotentiaries, on their side, asked for forty-eight hours in order to prepare their answer to this proposition. Accordingly, on the 21st they gave their answer, totally rejecting the propositions which had been made to the Conference. They stated to us, however, that they had propositions to make on the part of their Government, which they conceived would be in accordance with the demand that Turkey should be united more closely with the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe, and that some restriction should be placed upon the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea. The Plenipotentiaries of Austria, France, and Great Britain found those proposals of Russia entirely unacceptable, and refused to consider them in detail. The Plenipotentiary of Austria then said that, although these propositions had been rejected, he trusted that all the means of reconciling the belligerent parties by peace were not yet exhausted. To this the Plenipotentiaries of France and of Great Britain replied that their instructions were exhausted, and that they had no powers to consider any further propositions. I then considered that the best way of performing my duty would be to repair to my own Government, and to lay before them the whole state of the case with respect to the negotiations at Vienna, and the manner in which the conferences had been suspended. Two or three days afterwards the Minister of Foreign Affairs of France, having requested the orders of the Emperor, came to a similar determination. I believe he was expected to arrive in Paris last night, and I have no doubt he will lay before his Government his account of the occurrences that have taken place in the course of these negotiations.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish, Sir, to inquire whether, before the protocols of the conference are laid upon the table—and I trust they will be produced with all possible despatch—Her Majesty's Government have any objection to give us some preliminary papers—for instance, despatches of our Ambassador or Plenipotentiary at Vienna, which will afford us an authentic and official description of what the four points are? The noble Lord will perhaps recollect that at the present moment we have not the four points on the table of the House in an official form. I think, therefore, it would be very much for the convenience of the House if, without loss of time, we were put in possession of these preliminary papers, so that, before the protocls of the conferences are in our hands, we may clearly understand what were the data and the bases upon which those conferences took place, and why they were brought to an end.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think, Sir, the protocols themselves will pretty clearly explain what the four points were, but if the protocols do not afford sufficient information there can be no objection to laying some paper on the table that will give the requisite explanation. With regard to papers belonging to the long course of negotiation that preceded the conferences, I think there might be great objection to their production; but I will take care that the House shall be in full possession of a knowledge of the four points that were brought under the consideration of the conferences.

MR. DISRAELI: I am afraid, Sir, I did not make my question sufficiently clear to the noble Lord. I have no doubt that when the protocols are in our possession we shall clearly understand the nature of the four points; but, as the Government have only given a vague promise to produce the protocols, and have not fixed any time when they will be placed on the table, what I wished to know was, whether the noble Lord would have any objection to afford the House at once some authentic knowledge of what the four points of which we have heard so much consist? I should not, of course, press the Government for any private despatches; but if they would lay upon the table the single despatch in which the nature of the four points was communicated to Her Majesty's Government, so that the House may at once be placed in possession of that information, I think such a course would be highly satisfactory to hon. Members generally, and could not be attended with any inconvenience to Her Majesty's service.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Whatever papers can be produced will be laid before the House as soon as possible, and I do not think their production will be delayed so long as the right hon. Gentleman supposes.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish only for complete and satisfactory information. The noble Lord repeats that he will lay before the House as soon as possible the protocols of the conferences, but does he mean at the same time to produce the correspondence which took place between our Plenipotentiaries at Vienna and Her Majesty's Government in pursuance of the treaty of December 2, which in fact led to these

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I cannot at present say what papers beyond the protocols will be laid upon the table, but the Government will consider the subject.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he understood news had been received from Vienna that negotiations had been opened between Russia and some of the gentlemen or Ambassadors who had been left behind by the Plenipotentiaries. He wished to ask whether any negotiations of any sort or kind had been resumed at Vienna since the departure of the noble Lord opposite?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Since my noble Friend left Vienna, some proposals have been made by Russia which were not deemed likely by any of the representatives of the other Powers to lead to satisfactory results.

MR. BASS said, he wished to inquire what part Turkey had taken in the conferences?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot go into details, but the Turkish Plenipotentiaries were of the same mind as the Plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, France, and Austria.

Subject dropped.

LOAN BILL.

On the Order of the Day for considering the Bill as amended,

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that in reference to the clause which provides for the repayment of the loan by annual sums of 1,000,000L he doubted if the advocates of the measure themselves really and conscientiously believed that the promise they asked the House to give would be adhered to by succeeding Parliaments. It had been well pointed out by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn) the other night, that Parliament gave a pledge for the repayment of a loan at the rate of 5,000,000L per annum; and that so far from that legislative promise being observed, a very short time afterwards the 5,000,000L was reduced to 3,000,000L and ultimately at no distant date the payment was altogether abandoned. Considering, then, that such had been the course in that instance—and he thought he might say the invariable course, whenever a pledge of this nature had been given in an Act of Parliament—surely the House might reasonably doubt whether in this instance such a pledge could be redeemed, and whether it would be found practicable, and if practicable politic, to pay this large sum of 1,000,000L a year for the term of sixteen years after peace should be restored. He ventured, therefore, to ask the Government, upon what grounds they entertained the hope that the Minister and Parliament of 1860 or 1865 would be more ready to adhere to the pledges of their predecessors than were the Minister and Parliament of 1815 or 1820? He submitted that it was at once unjust and impolitic, and had a tendency to bring the House and the Government into discredit with the country, to hold out, in the form of a legislative enactment, a pledge to the people which they knew at the time they gave it could not reasonably be performed. And if it were not probable that the promise contained in the clause would be redeemed by future Ministers and Parliaments, then the introduction of such a clause was unnecessary, and was neither more nor less than a delusion and a snare. The pledge was not made conditional on the circumstances of the country, or the state of its finances. It was absolute in its character. Now, supposing that we should have, as in 1848–49, famine in Ireland, and a revolution in France, followed by commercial distress and convulsion, would the Ministers of the Crown be warranted, in such circumstances, in calling upon Parliament to adhere to this pledge? Most certainly not. Then, why should such a pledge be imposed? The proper course for the Minister to pursue was to apply the surplus revenues of the State in times of peace and prosperity to the gradual reduction and ultimate extinction of the debt. That was the course which had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors in office, and especially by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge, and it was the only rational course. Seeing, then, that the principle now sought to be introduced into the Bill had never been successful in practice, and that even if it admitted of practical application it was vicious and impolitic, he begged to move that the clause be expunged from the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 9, to leave out from the word "respectively," to the word "if," in line 39.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had explained, in former stages of the Bill, the grounds on which this clause was proposed by Her Majesty's Government. When called on to effect a loan for 16,000,000L, they thought it right that it should not remain as a charge on the nation in perpetuity, but felt themselves bound to make it on such terms as they believed would secure the probability of its extinction. It was generally admitted by those best acquainted with the condition of the money market that any attempt to borrow 16,000,000*l.* on terminable annuities would have resulted in failure ; and as an unsuccessful attempt on the part of the Government to effect a loan would have put them in a worse position for making a subsequent loan on more favourable terms than they would have been had they made no such attempt, they abandoned the idea of having exclusive recourse to a system of terminable annuities. There were two alternatives before the Government : one was, to borrow 14,000,000*l.* on perpetual annuities, and to repay in annual sums in successive years ; the other was that of borrowing on a permanent stock, rendering it incumbent on the Government to repay the sum at certain times. It would have been possible to borrow on a stock of thirty years' duration ; but then it would have been necessary at the end of those thirty years, that the Government should be prepared, either out of savings previously made or by other means, to raise a sum of 14,000,000*l.*, applicable to the extinction of debt at that particular period. All the experience of former years negatived the probability that any future Parliament would make a provision for so large a sum as 14,000,000*l.* for the extinction of the debt at a given time, or raise so large a sum, even in time of peace, without recurring to a new loan. Therefore it was thought preferable to borrow in perpetual annuities, making it incumbent on the Government at the return of peace to set aside an annual sinking fund of 1,000,000*l.* sterling for the extinction of that debt. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) said, that the Government in doing so were practising a delusion on the House, for they could not expect that so large a portion of the public revenue would be set aside by a future Parliament for that purpose. With the view of trying how far that criticism was or was not well founded, he would call attention to the operation of provisions made in former times for the extinction of the debt. Mr. Pitt's celebrated Act of 1786 enacted that 1,000,000*l.* should be expended annually in the purchase of stock, until the stock so purchased by the Commissioners should produce an interest of 4,000,000*l.*, to be applied to the redemption of the debt. That Act was certainly not observed during the years of war, and in 1823 another Act was passed charging the Consolidated Fund with 5,000,000*l.* annually, to be applied to the redemption of the debt. This was a positive charge on the Consolidated Fund, similar to the one created by the present Bill, and only differing in the amount. That Act remained in force until 1828, and in 1829 another Act was passed substituting the sum of 3,000,000*l.* for the former sum of 5,000,000*l.*, to be applied not only to the redemption of the funded debt, but also of the unfunded debt. The surplus so created might also be employed in the payment of deficiency bills, so that what was now called a sinking fund might then be applied to the purpose of the current expenditure. Under the operation of these several Acts, the reduction of the national debt during the six years from 1816 to 1822 only amounted to 8,000,000*l.*; but in the six years from 1822 to 1828, when the Act for the application of 5,000,000*l.* annually came into operation, the amount of the reduction of the national debt was 36,000,000*l.*, being the largest sum ever paid off in a similar period. With respect to the operation effected at the time when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Goulburn) was Chancellor of the Exchequer, that was a reduction of the interest of a portion of the debt—namely, the three and a half per cents. That operation was undoubtedly most advantageous to the public service ; but he was not aware that any reduction of the debt by the application of an annual surplus took place during the period when the right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the grounds he had explained, it had been thought expedient to introduce the present clause into the Bill. He was willing to admit that, if any extraordinary circumstances of pressure should occur during the years when that clause should come into operation, it might be necessary for a future Parliament to suspend its operation, and to allow the whole income to be applied to the current services of the year ; but he wished to call attention to the circumstance, that when the Long Annuities terminated in 1860 and the dead weight ceased, there would be a sum of 2,000,000*l.* annually available for the redemption of the debt. He thought, therefore, that there existed a fair prospect that there would be the desired means to extinguish this debt; but if the Government or Parliament of the day should think it inexpedient to apply so large a sum annually for that purpose, the remedy would be in their own hands. Until Parliament interfered, however, it would be incumbent on the Government to propose means for the payment of this 1,000,000*l.* annually towards the redemption of the loan now contracted.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he should feel it incumbent on him, if this matter went to a division, to vote with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly), in conformity with the strong opinion he entertained of the inexpediency of provisions of this nature. It was, in his opinion, beyond the legitimate province of the House of Commons of 1855 to undertake to determine what should be the financial policy of a future Parliament ten or fifteen years hence. Nor did he think that such a course had any tendency to secure a respect for the decisions of that House, either now or at any future time. He denied the right of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to fall back for support upon the Sinking Fund Acts of Mr. Pitt, because his right hon. Friend objected to the principle on which those Acts were founded. It was no doubt very natural for Parliament to persevere in taking measures for maintaining a sinking fund when there was an idea prevalent that some magical effect in the reduction of the debt was attributable to it. But, at the present period, when it was discovered not only that a sinking fund had no magical operation at all, but in a fiscal point of view was an extremely impolitic and wasteful proceeding, it was not to be supposed that Parliament would continue to act upon the principle with similar constancy. He should not regret to see a division take place on this subject, because those hon. Gentlemen who supported the clause would, if they should have the honour of sitting in Parliament when the clause ought to come into operation, feel bound, it was to be hoped, in honour, to support the repayment of the debt, whatever pressure might be put upon them by their constituents for the reduction of taxation in preference. He had no doubt that his right hon. Friend and himself, though voting to-night on different sides, would then be found supporting the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day in providing an adequate surplus for the reduction of the debt; but he feared that many of the hon. Gentlemen who would go into the lobby to vote for what they were pleased to call the assertion of a principle, would be disposed to flinch from the maintenance of that principle, when they felt a strong pressure from without for the reduction of the hop, malt, insurance, or paper duties. It had been said that this clause would insure the actual application of this 1,000,000*l.* per annum to the redemption of the debt, but he denied that this was so. Let them suppose they had arrived at a time of peace. In the next financial year they would have a surplus or they would not. If they had a surplus, this clause would be entirely inoperative, because, under the present law as it stood, they were bound to apply their surplus to the extinction of debt. Indeed, the clause in that case would do a positive mischief, because under the existing law the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be free to apply his surplus to the reduction of the public debt in whatever form it might seem most advantageous for the public at the time. If it should be expedient to reduce the unfunded debt, he might do it; if it should be expedient to buy up terminable annuities, he might do it; if it should be expedient to reduce Consols or the new three per cents, or the Reduced, he might make his choice among all the commodities in the market, and lay out his money to the best advantage for the public. But he could not do that under this clause, which bound him to apply his surplus of 1,000,000*l.* to the purchase of one particular commodity—the three per cent Consols. But let them suppose a different case—the occurrence of an adverse change of circumstances, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer found himself with a deficiency. What would then take place? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, under the law as it stood, might completely defeat the principle of the clause. The clause required him to issue 1,000,000*l.* from the Consolidated Fund. He issued it. The clause required him to purchase Consols. He purchased them. The clause required him to cancel those Consols. He cancelled them. But he could purchase his Consols from whomsoever he pleased—if he liked from the National Debt Commissioners. If he purchased them from the Commissioners, what would they do with the 1,000,000*l.* They would buy deficiency bills most probably; those bills would be cancelled, and so the money that was taken out of the revenue for one purpose would come back to it by a roundabout process for another. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would thus have the means of rendering the clause entirely nugatory. He was not prepared to say that circumstances might not arise in which it would not be the absolute duty of the Finance Minister to go through that process; because, practically, if he, when he had a deficient revenue, was obliged to apply 1,000,000*l.* annually to the purchase of stock, he would be redeeming debt with borrowed money, besides subjecting the public to the cost and charge of the operation. It was quite possible that the law might be altered; he himself thought that it ought to be altered; but such things as the purchase of deficiency bills in the way he had mentioned had taken place, and he had no doubt they would occur again. There was another point to which he wished to call the attention of the House. He had moved for a return showing the state of the Government account with the Bank of England so far as regarded the deposit received on account of the new loan. A sum of 1,600,000*l.* had been received on account of the loan, and the money was lying idle in the coffers of the Bank. At the same time the Government—not by any fault of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but under the provisions of the law—were paying interest to the Bank for a large amount of money, something like 2,500,000*l.*, supposed to be advanced to them by the Bank upon deficiency bills. It appeared to him that that state of the law was perfectly absurd. He knew he should be told that the faith of Parliament was not a sufficient security for the public creditor, and that it was necessary he should be assured his money was in the hands of the Bank, so that, if the Act of Parliament did not pass, he might know how to get it back again. He hoped the House would never assent to such doctrines. He knew there could be no higher security than the faith of the Bank of England; but if there could be a higher, it was the faith of Parliament; and it was important the country and Parliament should understand that it was a vote of the House of Commons which constituted a contract in the highest sense, and that there was no security, written or unwritten, that the public creditor could enjoy which was comparable to a vote of that House. He believed that altogether there were between 5,000,000*l.* and 6,000,000*l.* belonging to the Government at the present moment in the hands of the Bank, which did not produce one farthing, while the public was paying interest day by day upon 2,500,000*l.* which the Bank was supposed to lend to the Government; that was to say, the public was paying the Bank interest for giving them the use of their own money. He hoped the Government would be disposed to give the House, upon a convenient opportunity, the means of altering the law in this respect, and of authorising the immediate issue for public purposes of the deposits that might be received on account of the loan. With respect to the clause more immediately under discussion, he hoped the opinion of the House would be manifested in a sense favourable to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly), and that, if so, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would withdraw it from the Bill, especially since it was not connected with the substance of his measure or with the object he had in view.

MR. HENLEY said, that everything he had heard stated in favour of the clause made him view it with increased dislike. No man was more anxious than he was for a surplus revenue, but he believed that the clause, instead of furthering that object, would lay the foundation for breaking it down. In the beginning of a war, of which no one could foresee the end, the Government were laying down as a principle that one-sixteenth of the money they borrowed was to be paid off year by year out of the Consolidated Fund. He believed that the effects of the clause, though described as forming no part of the contract, would give ground for the charge of a breach of faith on the part of those who lent the money, if the stipulation which it contained should not be adhered to. Another inconvenience of the clause would be to make certain stocks more valuable than others. No man would be bold enough to say that circumstances might not arise, and probably would arise, when a future Parliament would not feel itself bound to carry out the provisions of the clause. The public creditor, therefore, would be in a position to say that in passing it in the first instance dust had been thrown into his eyes. In matters of this kind there was no security unless there was a clear bargain upon both sides. If the House divided on this clause he should vote with his hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly) against it, as it gave no security, and as it introduced an objectionable principle.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that if the question went to a division he should feel it his duty to vote with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite; but he so much wished that the financial scheme of the Government, which he approved as a whole, should pass without a division that he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider whether it was worth while to disturb the unanimity of the House by pressing this clause. There was no characteristic of that House which more honourably distinguished it--none which it was of more importance to preserve unassailed--than its strict adherence to the pledges it gave to the public creditor. He therefore saw with regret the House invited to give—he would not say a pledge, but a sort of assurance, which might be differently construed by different persons, and which might lead a future Parliament, for fear they should be charged with a breach of public faith, to do that which they might not consider expedient at the time, or to incur some degree of odium by refusing to carry out the object of the clause, and vote 1,000,000*l.* annually for the reduction of the debt. The whole question had been so ably argued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) that he would not waste the time of the House by attempting to repeat his statements; but he would again express a hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, seeing that the feeling of the House was against his clause, might consent to withdraw it from the Bill.

MR. T. DARING said, he rose to express quite a contrary opinion from that of the right hon. Gentleman who had last addressed them. When a clause was brought forward which bore upon it the stamp of honesty, and which was proposed by the Government in the performance of their duty to the country, he trusted they would be bold enough to stand by it in the face of all opposition. The House had been told that the question had been admirably argued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). He should say, pitting argument against argument, that the argument of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire was an answer to that of the right hon. Member for the University. Now, when it was considered that these 16,000,000*l.* were to be added to and amalgamated with some 600,000,000*l.* of previously existing Consols, it would be seen that the increased value of the new loan in consequence of this clause could not be so considerable as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) imagined. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University, on the other hand, said that if there were a surplus revenue the clause would be valueless, while, if there were none, the deficiency that would exist would have to be met from borrowed money. Now, the clause went to this extent, that in the annual Ways and Means a sum should be voted to discharge this 1,000,000*l.* per annum until the whole 16,000,000*l.* was repaid. The right hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Labouchere) said that he would rather promise nothing, because it would be wrong to fetter the action of a future Parliament. Was it not the bounden duty of Government to promise that posterity, if possible, would reduce the national debt? The right hon. Gentleman said, in effect, "We may be perfectly honest ourselves, but our successors may not be so." That was a wrong sentiment to pronounce. It was tantamount to saying to futurity, "We never expect you to reduce the national debt." The clause had been brought forward with statesmanlike views, and it would be disgraceful to the country if they were to say, "We will not be sponsors for those who are to follow us, because we are not sure that they will be as honest as ourselves." Perhaps peace was not so far off as some of them feared, and he hoped, with the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford, that those who voted for the adoption of this clause would stand by their vote and support a reduction of the debt. The right hon. Gentleman had evidently an intention to swell the number of those who opposed the clause when he said that at some future period, when they were asked to vote the 1,000,000*l.* annually, they would have their constituencies against them, and would find it impossible to resist the cry for a reduction of taxation. All that the present Parliament could do was to walk in the path of honesty. They might be forced by an unforeseen pressure to deviate from their vote of that evening. It was impossible to guard against such a contingency; but do not let them anticipate the evil day, and, by throwing out this clause, tell those who were to follow them that they would only do what was expected of them when they refused to vote a farthing for the reduction of the debt. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would press the clause to a division, so that he might ascertain who were in favour of and who were against a wise and gradual reduction of the debt.

Mr. J. L. RICARDO said, that if the doctrines of the hon. Gentleman who had just resumed his seat were to be generally received in financial matters the sum of 1,000,000*l.* a year would seem to be a very small amount to vote for the reduction of the debt. The right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) did not object to a sinking fund for the redemption of the national debt. He did not object to the diminution of that debt when their means would enable them to reduce it; but what he said was, that they ought not to pledge themselves at a certain period to make a reduction of the debt when they did not know whether they should have the means in their hands for making that reduction. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) said they were sure to have the means, because the vote of 1,000,000*l.* would be included in the Ways and Means. But supposing such an arrangement had been made ten years ago, and they had been obliged this year to vote 1,000,000*l.* for the repayment of part of the national debt, what would be their present position? They would actually be borrowing money at something like 87*½* in order to pay off a portion of the debt at par. That appeared to him to be an erroneous financial system; and he would take this opportunity of saying that when he heard hon. Members talk of how desirable it would be to raise the loan by means of terminable annuities, he did not understand that principle of finance which established a forced sinking fund—for terminable annuities were nothing but a forced sinking fund—and required a certain portion of the debt to be paid off annually at par, whether or not they had means at their disposal, or even, in fact, whether they were obliged to borrow money at a high rate of interest. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who did not himself seem to be deeply fixed in his resolution to carry this clause, would not press it to a division, seeing that there was a very strong feeling against it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman had not correctly represented his feeling in the matter.

Mr. J. L. RICARDO said, he certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman not to have made up his mind as to the necessity of inserting the clause, and still hoped he would not press it to a division.

Mr. WILSON said, that if there had been one opinion expressed more strongly and decidedly than another by hon. Members on both sides of the House, it had been that loans should be created in the form of terminable annuities. Now, the principle of terminable annuities was analogous to that embodied in the clause before the House. It was quite clear that the setting apart of a certain sum of money annually for the repayment of the loan would have the same effect as if the loan had been created in terminable annuities. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford said that, in the event of there being no surplus, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer being obliged to apply 1,000,000*l.* to the liquidation of stock, the money might return into the expenditure for the year. But the right hon. Gentleman was aware that if by the means he stated the Government were to borrow from the National Debt Commissioners upon deficiency bills, those bills must be repaid to the Commissioners from the produce of the same quarter; while, on the other hand, if the Government borrowed on Consolidated Fund bills, those bills would be repaid from the produce of the following quarter. The hon. Member for Stoke upon Trent (Mr. J. L. Ricardo) had made another objection to the clause; he said they were borrowing with one hand to pay with another. But that was scarcely a correct view of the operation. Surely, however, it was an advantage, if the Government could make such an arrangement as would enable the Commissioners for the National Debt to go into the market and purchase 1,000,000*l.* of stock at the price of the day. By that means they would have their stock, not at par, but at its value in the open market. When hon. Members talked of the folly of paying off debt while they were borrowing, they ought to observe that the clause would not come into operation until the conclusion of the war; and therefore the absurdity practised under the old sinking fund, of borrowing money to pay off debt, did not at all affect the provision now before the House. Again, when it was stated that future Governments would have difficulty in maintaining a surplus, he thought that ought to be the very reason why that House should now insist upon provision being made for the repayment of this 1,000,000*l.* annually. Pass the clause, and future Governments would not have a choice as to the repayment of the loan. They must provide for it in the same way as for every charge placed upon the Consolidated Fund. It would not be a matter of option to them; and if they wanted to evade the payment of the 1,000,000*l.* annually, they would be obliged to come down and ask that House to repeal the Act. For these reasons he hoped the House would support the clause as it stood.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury are not satisfactory. He says the House approves the principle of borrowing money upon terminable annuities; that the proposition contained in this clause is analogous to such a principle; and he therefore calls upon us to support it. But it is an assumption on the part of the hon. Gentleman to suppose that the House has sanctioned the principle of terminable annuities. If this House has sanctioned that principle, why has not the Government acted upon it? It is very true we have had observations made here—I have often thought without sufficient consideration—upon the admirable character of the terminable annuity system, and certainly for some short time those observations were made without criticism; but there has been no vote in this House in favour of borrowing money upon that system, and, therefore, I think the hon. Gentleman is not justified in assuming that the principle is one which has the sanction of Parliament. I, for one, entirely agree in the view which has been expressed in this House, and more particularly by the hon. Member for Stoke upon Trent (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), that such a mode of raising a loan is very questionable and suspicious. It may be popular among those who have not given due consideration to the subject, but go into the City, inquire among the capitalists and men of business. They know very well what a terminable annuity means; they know that it is, in fact, borrowing money to create a sinking fund, and they will ascertain in a moment the exact value of your offer, and the premium you are giving for raising money in this form. I trust the House will hesitate before it assents to this 22nd clause. What is it? It is neither more nor less than a recurrence to the system of creating an artificial sinking fund; and to my mind no principle can be more pernicious. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has to-night adverted to the experience which the country has of sinking funds, touched upon the period extending, I think, from 1822 to 1828, when a sinking fund of 5,000,000*l.* was obtained, and, comparatively speaking, a considerable reduction of the public debt was effected—the only time when such a reduction has been effected. That reduction amounted to something more than 30,000,000*l.* in the course of six years; but how did you create your 5,000,000*l.* per annum of sinking fund even at that time? By an increased taxation, the depressing effect of which upon the national industry and the national wealth was no doubt more injurious than the proportionate benefit you obtained by that reduction in the incumbrances of the country. I think there is also another objection to this course; it appears to me that it will interfere with the Sinking Fund Act which we now possess. To the principle of that Act, although it may certainly be modified and improved in some particulars, I am a firm adherent, believing, as I do, that it has worked with considerable advantage to the country and to the public debt. Now, by this clause, the House must recollect that they will be forced on the termination of the war, whatever may happen, to apply annually to the reduction of a particular branch of the public debt a sum of 1,000,000*l.* sterling. At a moment when you may be pressed hard with public liabilities you will have this claim upon your resources, and will have to provide for this artificial sinking fund. I think we ought not to sanction such a system. And, then, another objection also suggests itself—either this clause has a genuine purpose or it has not. It is very well to say the clause does not form part of the contract for the loan; that this is not an arrangement which at all affects the public creditor who lent you this money. Remember that at the very time you are raising the loan you publicly announce that you are making an arrangement to liquidate the liabilities which you are now incurring. Now, is it not open to great objection that, when you are borrowing money, you should infuse into the public mind a conviction that there is a facility for getting rid of the incumbrance? In such a case, instead of the public feeling that a loan is a resource which we ought to make use of only under circumstances of great pressure—instead of their feeling that in raising a loan they are incurring a liability which will press heavily upon them and those who follow after them—you have the Minister of Finance impressing the country with the idea that while they are borrowing this money they are at the same time establishing a certain machinery by which the incumbrance, after a certain time, may be got rid of. But there is not a man in this House who would peril any stake of importance upon the contingency that this will ever be a valid means of effecting the purpose you wish to accomplish; and I therefore hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer, seeing that the opinion of this House is not in favour of this clause, will not press it. I feel anxious that we should not unnecessarily divide upon this question; and, as the right hon. Gentleman has told us to-night that this clause forms no part of his contract, I think, therefore, he can have no difficulty in withdrawing it from the Bill. He can do that now with facility; but, if he allows it to remain, five years hence no Gentleman who fills his position will be able to get up and maintain successfully in this House that the clause does not form part of the public contract. It will be always maintained that this was a solemn engagement entered into by Parliament with the public creditor. For these reasons, if a division be taken, I certainly shall vote for the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Kelly).

MR. GLYN said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not accede to the advice given him by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). His (Mr. Glyn's) only regret was that 20,000,000*l.* had not been taken at once. The very argument used by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire was the one that would induce him to take a view opposed to the view of that right hon. Gentleman. He looked upon the clause as an attempt authoritatively to give a decision of the House to the actual formation of a bond fide sinking fund. Had his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke upon Trent (Mr. J. L. Ricardo) considered the clause, he would have found that it did not come into operation till the arrival of a time of peace, when the surplus revenue of the country would give the means of supplying the 1,000,000*l.* required. He thought no House of Commons would come forward to repeal a pledge given in an Act of Parliament for a particular object, whereas in point of fact leaving a reduction of the national debt as it now stood, merely upon a casual surplus revenue arising from time to time, seemed to him to be one of those unsatisfactory and unproductive measures which would never lead to any permanent result. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite right in laying it down as a principle to be adopted in all future loans, that whenever the House went into the market to raise loans it should, at the same time, take care that the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being should find it necessary to keep up a surplus revenue for the ultimate wiping off of that loan. He thought there was no principle which contained so much as that did the germ of security for the finances of the country, and also for the proper administration of the national debt.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he thought it would have been better to have raised 20,000,000*l.* at once than to have imposed additional taxation upon articles of primary necessity, such as tea, coffee, and sugar. He objected to Parliament pledging itself by the present clause to that which might place future Parliaments in an embarrassing position, and he regarded the proposition to pay off the debt by 1,000,000*l.* annually as a Pisgah view of a promised land.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was desirous of making one observation in reply to the remarks of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn), who vindicated the clause upon a ground entirely inconsistent with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That right hon. Gentleman had told the House that the clause formed no part of the contract, but might be dealt with by the House as it pleased, and by future Houses as they pleased; but the hon. Member for Kendal not only treated it as obligatory in his argument, but hoped it would be made the foundation of an important precedent; and that in each succeeding year, if there should exist a necessity for contracting further loans, a similar clause would be inserted in every Loan Bill, and that all future loans should be redeemed at the rate of 1,000,000*l.* a year. But let the House suppose that at the commencement of the last war a similar clause had been inserted in the first Loan Bill, and according to the argument of his hon. Friend, had been made a precedent in each succeeding loan, in what position would the House of Commons have found itself at the end of the war? It would have found itself with a clause in all its Loan Bills compelling it to expend at the commencement of the peace a larger sum of money annually in liquidation of those loans than was expended in the year 1853 in all the services of all the Ways and Means that were voted in that year. Parliament would not have been prepared to fulfil those pledges, and such pledges, therefore, ought not to be given. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Kendal that the clause would be regarded as a pledge; and it was very undesirable that when debts were contracted they should afterwards hear it disputed whether a provision was or was not part of a contract. He sincerely regretted that he should be forced to vote against the proposal of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the matter were pressed to a division, for he joined in the desire that they should give to the Government, as up to that time they had given, their cordial, unanimous, and undivided support.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, from the desire expressed on both sides of the House, I had hoped that this Bill would pass without a division; but at the same time I think the principle involved in the clause now under discussion so important that I for one have determined to take the sense of the House upon it. I think the principle of the Bill to be simply this—whether Parliament and the country, when obliged by circumstances to add to the public debt, shall or shall not make any effort whatever to reduce in future years the debt which is so incurred. Now, it is obvious that no country can face any great emergency arising from a war, for which great efforts are to be made, without providing means over and above the ordinary revenues of the country, over and above those additional means which may be provided by increased taxation. No war of any magnitude can be undertaken by any country whatever without loans raised upon honest principles, or if without loans, those forced contributions, contributions of war, by which in some cases armies may be supported during the brief progress of a campaign. Now, according to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, the country ought never to make any endeavours whatever to reduce its debt, because the efforts made, and the taxation raised for that purpose, would deduct more from the springs of industry of the country than they did good by the reduction of the debt which might be incurred. In another part of his speech the right hon. gentleman praised that system by which the surplus income of the country is to be applied to the reduction of the debt. But how can a surplus income arise but from the produce of the taxation over and above the service of the particular year? I for one hold that it would be very desirable that this House should lay down as a principle—that which has been indeed already established as a principle—viz., that there should be in every year, if possible, a surplus income applicable to the reduction of the debt. It has been asserted by Gentlemen on this side of the House that we contended that the sanction of Parliament had been given to the principle of terminable annuities. Undoubtedly there is a great advantage in terminable annuities, and fortunate would it have been for us if loans had been contracted in former years upon terminable annuities, for the country would then have been relieved from the pressure of that debt which now weighs so heavily upon the industry and resources of the country. But I am aware there are great difficulties in contracting a loan of any amount upon the principle of terminable annuities, and I am also ready to admit the truth of what is stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, that it may be doubted whether it is an economical measure to provide for the reduction of your debt. There can be no doubt that the most economical method must be to raise your loan on that stock and in that way in which you can obtain it in the cheapest manner possible, and then apply in time of peace a surplus revenue for the purpose of buying up that debt upon the cheapest terms of the market. That is very much the principle of the proposal of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has negotiated a loan on those terms on which it was most advantageous at this moment to contract it, and he provides by this clause for the gradual redemption of it in time of peace. The arguments used by the opponents of that scheme resolve themselves into two classes. Some hon. Gentlemen have objected to this clause, because they say it is a mere nullity, that it contains a promise which will not be performed, that it gives no security for the reduction of the debt; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr.

Gladstone) objected, for he said, five years hence some future Chancellor of the Exchequer would find himself embarrassed by a pledge he would be unable to fulfil. Therefore, while some gentlemen object because the clause is a nullity, others object because it is too stringent. I think this will be an obligation. It is my opinion that this will be, like all other Acts of Parliament, binding upon Parliament until repealed, and, therefore, that so long as this clause remains, Parliament will find the means of raising a revenue sufficient for the purposes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But if, unfortunately, circumstances should arise which would make it impossible for him to continue payment, it would be for the wisdom of the Parliament of that time to reconsider the question. I cannot admit that this would be a dangerous principle to adopt, or that it would not be considered by Parliament as an obligation to be fulfilled. But if the necessity arises to incur an addition to our debt, the application of real surplus revenue to the gradual payment of that debt has this advantage, that while on the one hand you add 16,000,000l. to the debt of the country, on the other hand you are holding out a prospect that, at the end of a certain period of years, you will, out of a bona fide surplus revenue, find the means of extinguishing that addition to our debt.

INCOME TAX BILL.

House in Committee; Mr. FITZROY in the Chair.

Clause 1.

MR. HILDYARD said, he wished to move, in page 2, line 6, after "respectively," to insert—

"If such annual value or amount shall reach or exceed 150*l.*, and an additional rate and duty of 1*d.* for every 20*s.* of the annual value or amount of all such property, profits, and gains respectively, if such annual value or amount shall reach or exceed 100*l.* and not reach 150*l.*"

The object of his Amendment was to preserve the same ratio in the increase of the tax as had been made in the tax itself as levied upon incomes exceeding 100*l.* a year and those exceeding 150*l.* a year. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to add 2*d.* indiscriminately to the tax laid upon both descriptions of income; but to do so was to tax the income below 150*l.* a year at a higher rate than the income exceeding that sum, because an addition of 2*d.* upon 10*d.* was an increase of 20 per cent, while to add the same sum to 14*d.* was under 14*½* per cent. What he proposed, therefore, was that, upon incomes below 150*l.* a year, and greater than 100*l.*, the increase should be 1*½d.* instead of 2*d.*, as the class of persons possessing the smaller income was precisely that class who could least afford to pay increased taxes. The argument might be used that, to accede to his proposal would involve a loss of revenue, but the loss would be but small; and, even if it were not, no fear of loss could justify what was unjust. It might also be said, that the pence would be more easy of collection; but he could not understand how that could be the case. Since he had placed the present Motion on the paper, he had received letters upon the subject from a large number of persons, all of whom concurred in requesting him to press it to a division.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he should have great pleasure in seconding the Amendment. He had always opposed the income tax as an innovation, just as he had opposed the establishment of Crystal Palaces, and he was ready to support any mitigation of that impost, in whatever shape it might be proposed. The object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to raise money by this Bill; but he only wished that every Member who sat on the Treasury benches was subjected to double or treble income tax. Those Gentlemen got their money for doing nothing, and called upon the country to pay the taxes. He would always oppose the income tax as long as he had a seat in that House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was quite true, as the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Amendment had stated, that the adoption of his proposal would produce only a slight diminution of the revenue, but it would also be a matter of very slight consideration so far as the taxpayers themselves were concerned, for upon an income of 150*l.* a year the difference would only be 6*s.* per annum, which could hardly be felt by any class of the community. He did not wish to pledge the House against the principle of discrimination with respect to the duty to be levied upon incomes of different amounts, but he thought the splitting of a penny would give considerable additional trouble to the department charged with the collection of this tax. He thought some inconvenience might be occasioned by the application of the hon. and learned Gentleman's scale to Schedule B—the farmer's schedule—for in some cases in England the tax to be levied would be 5*½d.*, and in the case of Irish and Scotch farmers, 3*½d.* The hon. and learned Gentleman brought forward his Amendment as a matter in which persons of small incomes felt great interest, and as he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) considered it might be thought a somewhat harsh proceeding if he were to oppose the proposition, he would accede to its adoption.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to know if the principle of the Amendment which the right hon. Baronet had just sanctioned in respect to incomes between 100*l.* and 150*l.* a year, was to be applied to the assessment of the income tax on the farmers of England and Scotland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the income of the English farmer was assessed at half his rental, and the income of the Scotch farmer at one-third. On this income so assessed the tax was levied. In those cases where the percentage in the rental came under 150*l.* and down to 100*l.* the principle of the Amendment would apply, and the farmer would thus have all the benefit which was to be obtained from the Amendment referred to. It was not necessary to make any alteration for that purpose in the Bill now in Committee.

MR. COWAN said, he wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a case of great inequality connected with the manner in which the income tax was assessed in Scotland as compared with England. In England, the landed proprietor was assessed on the net annual value of his property, after deducting rates and taxes. In Scotland the assessment was made on the gross income. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider the matter, with a view to the amendment of such a state of things.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the law upon the subject was perfectly similar in England and Scotland. In England, if the landlord was charged with any rate, such as sewers and improvement rates, he was not entitled to deduct their amount from his income tax assessment. The law in Scotland was similar, but it happened in Scotland that certain rates, which in England were usually paid by the tenant, fell upon the landlord. That was, however, a matter of arrangement between the landlord and tenant; but with respect to the law, he would repeat there was no difference between England and Scotland.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.

Order for Committee read; House in Committee; Mr. FitzRoy in the Chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Committee will, I doubt not, remember that when this Bill was last before us, a question was raised on Clauses 4, 5, 6, and 7, relative to registration and securities. A discussion took place on the structure of those clauses, and it was pointed out that certain inconveniences would arise under their operation; that, in certain cases, a sort of publication not coming within the range of the original Acts would be included, and that, in certain other cases, particular publications that did come within the operation of the original Acts would be excluded. I felt that these remarks had in them some foundation; and, though the clauses referred to were framed on the principle of removing penalties and securing the obligation of registration and securities merely by the operation of seeking stamps, I thought it was better to reconsider the matter, and accordingly asked the Committee to postpone the clauses and report progress. I have since reconsidered the matter, and, after the best consideration I can give to the subject, I have come to the conclusion that, on the whole, it will be the safer course for me not to interfere with the existing law, but simply to leave it as it now stands with respect both to registration and securities. These will be applicable to all newspapers, according to the terms of the Act; and, though we shall certainly leave in operation the difficulty which the Board of Inland Revenue has found as to the interpretation of the word "newspaper," that difficulty will be considerably diminished when the operation of the compulsory stamp is removed. I confess I do not think the state of the law will be altogether satisfactory; but, on the whole, I am disposed to stand on the existing law, and allow it to be enforced by penalties. I therefore propose to omit Clauses 4, 5, and 7, and, with regard to Clause 6, which will remain, I shall propose some verbal alterations required by the omissions that are to take place.

On the question that the 4th Clause be omitted,

MR. G. BUTT said, he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to mean that he intended the law as to registration and giving security to remain applicable to all newspapers. By the Bill as it stood the Government intended to confine the obligation of registering and giving security to those particular publications that chose to avail themselves of the postal advantages proposed to be given; but the effect of the omission of this clause, as he understood it, would be to relieve particular publications from that obligation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: All particular publications that are not newspapers.

Clause struck out; as was also Clause 5.

Clause 6 agreed to, with certain verbal alterations.

Clause A.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had now to propose the clause of which he had given notice, limiting the retransmission by post of periodical publications. He proposed this clause as being a reasonable limitation in the right of retransmission. In practice it was found that persons in possession of newspapers, and wishing to send them to a distance, transmitted them by post merely to be used as waste paper, and without any view of their being read. The privilege of unlimited transmission led to large quantities of waste paper being thus sent by post; the right of transmission was abused, and additional cost was thrown upon the conveyance of papers. He therefore proposed the reasonable limit of fifteen days.

MR. G. BUTT said, he wished to direct attention to some confusion which he feared would arise under the Act as it was now proposed to stand, owing to the adoption in different clauses of the terms "periodical publication" and "newspaper," when the same thing was meant. He did not oppose the clause, but he thought that it would be necessary slightly to alter the language, in order to make the different parts of the Bill harmonise.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it would no doubt be necessary carefully to examine and compare all the clauses of the Bill. He did not think that there was any error in the present clause, but he was much obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman for drawing his attention to the subject.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to know whether it was intended to give the right of transmission and retransmission through the post as frequently as one chose within the fifteen days?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that it was; but beyond fifteen days from the date of publication no newspaper would be entitled to the privilege of transmission through the post. If the Committee considered the period of fifteen days too limited, it might be extended.

Clause B.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER next proposed a clause for determining how questions as to periodical publications should be decided. It provided that, so far as referred to their transmission through the post, the question should be referred to the determination of the Postmaster General, whose decision, with the consent of the Treasury, should be final.

Clause agreed to.

Clause C, relating to the manner in which warrants and consents of Treasury were to be given, was abandoned.

Clause D. (Actions or suits might be carried on in the names of the registered proprietors of newspapers on behalf of themselves and co-proprietors.)

1981      Newspaper Stamp      {April 30, 1855}      Duties Bill.      1982

MR. G. BUTT said, he thought, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider the laws which were applicable to this class of subjects generally, that he would come to the conclusion that this was a clause which ought not to be adopted. It contained a provision which was perfectly new to the law of the country, and if it were adopted it would apply to no other publication except a newspaper, because no other publication was required to be registered. The effect of the clause was to enable the registered proprietors of newspapers to sue for debts and other contracts in their own names, without joining all the parties in the concern as plaintiffs in the action. But upon what principle was this to be done? If there were a firm of booksellers the partners must all be joined, and what reason was there for taking the proprietors of newspapers out of the operation of the law as it stood? The proposition which was now before the Committee was not properly analogous to that contained in the Joint Stock Act, which enabled proprietors in companies where there were many partners, upon registering themselves and continuing to register any alteration in the firm as it arose, to sue in the name of the registered officer. That Act also provided, if the registered officer failed in his suit, and judgment went against him, that it would be a judgment against all the partners in the concern; so that all would be, as they ought to be, amenable for the judgment obtained against them in the name of their registered officer. In the present case, however, there was no such provision, and the clause standing therefore in the isolated position in which it did was clearly contrary to every principle of existing law, and to every Act of Parliament which had ever been passed for giving facilities to parties for suing and being sued. Suppose that a newspaper were the property of six proprietors, what reason could there be for exempting them from the responsibility of their ownership? Of course he spoke not of the respectable newspapers in the metropolis and throughout the country, the registered proprietors of which would, no doubt, be able to satisfy any judgment which might go against them; but he would take the case of smaller publications, in which it might be convenient to register as the proprietors persons who had no funds whatever, while there were other partners in the concern who might be capable of answering any judgment which might be obtained against them. He therefore contended that, under the clause as it was proposed, there were no means of meeting such a case. The General Joint Stock Act, 7th & 8th of Vict. chap. 110, contained proper provisions for doing justice, and rendered it necessary for every change in the firm, the addition of every new partner, and the ceasing of a man to be a partner to be registered; and the public officer was obliged once a year to make a return of all such alterations. He must give in a list of the whole of the proprietors, and should any alteration be made in the period which elapsed between the times of making the general returns, it was required to be duly noted. It was provided, too, by the Joint Stock Act, that a suit should not abate by reason of the death of the plaintiff, for the reason that he was merely the nominal plaintiff, and a judgment was in effect a judgment against the whole of the parties concerned; so that a sufficient remedy was given. But here there was a palpable omission. The right hon. Gentleman could not have known the state of the law; for if he had intended to adopt the law to be found in the Banking Act, or the Joint Stock Act, he had so worded the clause as to render it entirely ineffective, and would enable a paper which was started for the purposes of piracy, or as a vehicle for slander, to register a nominal man, to sue and be sued, and the consequence would be that persons who should get judgment against such person would be without remedy. There was no principle of law which, if a debt were due, for instance, on a bill of exchange to newspaper proprietors, would enable one party to sue, when if a respectable firm, composed of six persons, had a debt due from a newspaper proprietary, they would all be obliged to join in the suit. The clause was not so worded as to do justice between parties who might be plaintiffs and defendants in a suit, and any hon. Gentleman conversant with the law would tell the right hon. Gentleman that such a principle was totally unknown to it, and was now for the first time imported into the House. At present, proprietors of newspapers were registered for the purpose of giving facilities for fixing the parties in cases of libel; but the registration of a portion of them did not hinder him from joining the whole of the proprietors in the suit if he pleased. On these grounds, therefore, he submitted that the clause was not a proper one, and he should consequently move its rejection.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the present law provided that there should be two registered parties subject to legal proceedings, and might be made defendants to any civil action.

MR. G. BUTT : Not to civil actions. It relates to actions for libel and not for debt.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : At all events they were subject to criminal proceedings, and it had been represented to him as a hardship that, while they were thus subject, individually, to be made defendants, no relative right was given them of suing. Any two registered proprietors were subject to a judgment in an action. He apprehended that the principal persons registered would be the printer and publisher, and no doubt they would have sufficient funds to give security for costs. The object of this clause was to place them in the same position with regard to suing as that in which they were when they were being sued.

MR. G. BUTT said, that the provision of registration did not limit the right of parties to sue the registered proprietors only, in cases of contract. They might if they pleased, sue all the proprietors. It was, therefore, impossible that this clause could be supported on any principle of law, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not press it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it was a clause in which the Government had no interest whatever, but it had been suggested with a view of doing away with a hardship existing under the present law. He had no objection, in consequence of the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman, to postpone its further consideration till the third reading.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he begged to inquire whether any determination had been come to with respect to the registration ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Those clauses have been withdrawn for the present. I now beg to move the clause which proposes to give the protection of a copyright of twenty-four hours on certain articles in newspapers. The present Copyright Act in its interpretation clause includes newspapers, and it certainly appears to have been the intention of the Legislature in passing that Act to give the full benefit of copyright to newspapers as well as to all other classes of printed publications. But the clauses introduced into that Act seem to have been formed principally with reference to encyclopedias, reviews, magazines, periodicals, and works of larger bulk and less frequent publication than daily or weekly newspapers, and imposed certain conditions with respect to copyright which could scarcely have been fulfilled in the case of newspapers, and therefore practically nullified the benefits which the Act appeared to concede to them. Inasmuch, however, as it has been imputed to the Government that in introducing this measure, which affects large daily newspapers, conferring upon the public great advantages by collecting and diffusing intelligence at considerable expense through all parts of the world, it gives facilities for pirating the information they contain, and disseminating it without any cost—inasmuch as it has been charged upon the Government that they wished to encourage a dishonest course of that sort, and having had no such intention, they feel it incumbent upon them to lay before the House a clause like the present, in which a copyright is given to the articles in newspapers, and a remedy proposed for the infringement of that copyright. The model of this cheap remedy already exists in the Act with respect to the copyright of designs, which has received the sanction of Parliament. I am free to admit that if this clause should be rigidly or vexatiously enforced by the leading metropolitan newspapers, the rights which have by consent hitherto been exercised by the London evening and weekly newspapers, and by the country newspapers, would be materially abridged. It is undoubtedly true that the general intelligence, the reports of the debates in this and the other House of Parliament, the reports of proceedings in courts of justice, the reports of the transactions at public meetings and on other public occasions, which are obtained at a considerable cost by the proprietors of the leading metropolitan journals, are transferred into other papers by the mere process of copying, and without any expenditure of money on their part whatever. That practice has grown up, and has been acquiesced in by the principal newspapers for a long series of years ; and it certainly would be a considerable detriment to the public at large if any attempt should now be made to abridge the rights thus conceded by practice ; but it is not my belief that the leading London newspapers would seek to exercise the powers which this clause would confer in any harsh and oppressive manner. The proprietors of newspapers, like other persons in this country, live under the influence of public opinion. Though newspapers, to a great extent, act as the guides of public opinion, they are also themselves in return peculiarly amenable to the influence of public opinion, and it is not my belief, looking to the manner in which the principal metropolitan newspapers are conducted, that their proprietors would seek by a harsh, novel, or oppressive use of the powers of this clause to prevent that transcription of intelligence from their columns which practice has hitherto sanctioned. My belief is that this clause would merely be brought into use in cases where a newspaper might be set up with the deliberate intention of pirating the principal newspapers, and of transferring into its columns intelligence, articles of original composition, and other communications, animo furandi—with the deliberate intention of making the profits of the newspaper depend on such ill-gotten gains. Under these circumstances, it is desirable that a cheap, quick, and certain remedy should be afforded to those newspaper proprietors whose intelligence should be so taken from them. I shall now, therefore, beg to move the insertion of the following clause:—

"The proprietors of every newspaper shall, for the purpose of protection against piracy, be entitled to a copyright in every original article, letter, paragraph, communication, and composition which shall be for the first time published in such newspaper in this country; and if any person shall, within twenty-four hours after the first publication of any original article, letter, paragraph, communication, or composition in any such newspaper, print or publish any copy of such original article, letter, paragraph, communication, or composition, or of any material part thereof, or any colourable abridgment or alteration of the same, such person shall for every such offence forfeit a sum of not less than 5*l.*, nor exceeding 30*l.*, to the proprietors of the newspaper against whom such offence has been committed; and it shall be lawful for the printer or publisher of such last-mentioned newspaper, on behalf of the proprietors thereof, to recover such penalty by a summary proceeding before a stipendiary magistrate who has, or two justices who have, jurisdiction where the party offending resides, who shall issue a summons requiring such party to appear on a day and at a time and place to be named in such summons (such time not being less than two days from the date thereof); and every such summons shall be served on the party offending, either in person or at his usual place of abode; and, either upon the appearance or the default to appear of the party offending, such magistrate or justices may proceed to hear the complaint; and upon proof of the offence, by confession, or upon the oath of one or more credible witnesses (which oath such magistrate and justices are respectively hereby authorised to administer), may convict the offender in a penalty of not less than 5*l.*, nor more than 30*l.*, as to such magistrate or justices may seem fit; and if the amount of such penalty and the cost of the proceeding, which shall be assessed by such magistrate or justices, shall not be forthwith paid, the same shall be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the offender, and such magistrate or justices shall grant warrants accordingly."

MR. WHITESIDE said, he was of opinion that the proposed clause would not accomplish the object which the right hon. Gentleman had so clearly explained—namely, to protect the rights of the proprietors of the principal metropolitan journals. In that object he (Mr. Whiteside) entirely concurred, but it was to the clause to be moved by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) that he should give his support, being of opinion that it was unjust to visit with restrictions any journal—he did not care what journal it might be—on account of its success. He regarded, therefore, the clause of the hon. Member for Pontefract more as a matter of benefit to the community than to any particular paper. But he confessed that it appeared to him that the Committee was now called on by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do what was never done before—to limit the blessings of printing, and stifle the electric telegraph as far as possible. Of this he was satisfied, however, that the clause was wholly impracticable. He agreed in the argument used by the right hon. Gentleman, and which had been used elsewhere, that a newspaper, though it did not invent news—yet sometimes, he should say, otherwise—though it did not invent the facts which occurred at Vienna, if any facts did occur there—still, it carried the intelligence with great speed and industry, and with his consent it should be paid, if that were possible, for its extraordinary diligence and speed in carrying facts. But, what was the meaning of a copyright in news he could not imagine. News must exist, and half-a-dozen men might carry news from Vienna, but one might carry it more rapidly than another, and the proposition should be to pay the particular journal which, by zeal and activity, got the news the soonest into this metropolis. He admitted that original articles of great ability appeared in the principal newspapers, but it was a compliment to quote them, and a testimony to the talent and ability with proprietors, who expended much money and much trouble for the service of the public.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) in thinking that it was impracticable to establish a copyright in news. One argument advanced by the hon. and learned Member for Bath (Mr. Phinn) in favour of the present clause had certainly astonished him—namely, that they might trust to the moderation of the proprietors of newspapers that they would not exercise the right they might acquire by this Bill in a rigorous spirit. He knew it was the fashion to praise the press, but he very much doubted whether, in the exercise of power, the proprietors of newspapers displayed a spirit which showed them to be exceptional to their species. But, in addition to the objection to the clause on principle, the Committee must see that it was totally objectionable in respect to its practical operation. It not only provided against the pirating of a whole article, but also against "any colourable abridgment or alteration of the same." Now, it would require the most critical mind to describe what a colourable abridgment of a newspaper article was. What was a newspaper? An ephemeris—an insect of the day—which, having performed all its functions, in a few hours disappeared. It could not for a moment be put on the footing of great works—such as those of poets, orators, and historians. To place on the same level with the writings of the right hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay) the correspondence of a newspaper from Vienna and Berlin would be most preposterous. He protested against investing editors and proprietors with such extensive powers on the ground of trusting to their moderation and forbearance.

MR. BENTINCK said, he entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken as to the want of force in the argument advanced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, that he was prepared to trust to the good feeling of the editors of newspapers in carrying out this clause. Without reverting to the able remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen, who, he believed, had shown that the clause could never be practically carried into effect, he thought there was another ground of objection to the clause. He could not understand on what ground any man was to claim a copyright in an anonymous article in a newspaper. The law of copyright applied to works of durable interest, or, at least, to works on some independent and continuous subject, the authors of which were known; and he thought it impossible to legislate on the same principle with respect to such works and to ephemeral and anonymous articles in newspapers. It was absurd to say that there was any copyright possessed by proprietors of newspapers in articles appearing in their journals, when they all knew that in nine cases out of ten they were not written by the proprietors, or were even purchased matter. But, while he considered it objectionable to attempt to enforce a copyright in the case of newspapers, when they had no possible means of ascertaining in whom such a right existed, he still retained a strong opinion against the whole measure. He believed the inevitable result of it would be to produce such a revolution in the newspaper press that, for the sake of the public and for the sake of the respectable portion of the newspapers themselves, it would be absolutely necessary to make new laws altogether on the subject of the press. If this Bill passed into a law they ought to require a signature to every article in order to determine who were the responsible persons, and thereby maintain the stability of the respectable portion of the press, and counteract the inundation of mischievous papers which must inevitably follow such a law. He believed, from all the information he had been able to acquire, that the effect of this law would be to ruin the whole of the respectable portion of the provincial press. Without referring to the discreet or indiscreet use required from the proprietors of London papers of the power that would be vested in them, he believed that the respectable portion of the provincial press would cease to exist—a press which in some places, in point of talent and circulation, equalled the press of London, and that in their stead they would have an inundation of small publications which would become the curse of the country; he therefore trusted the Committee would reject the clause.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he did not think that the hon. and learned Member for Bath (Mr. Phinn) had advanced any great argument in favour of the clause now before the Committee. He remembered the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) once made an observation to the hon. and learned

Member that he liked his principles and admired his speech, but he could not vote for his Resolution. So the hon. and learned Gentleman now said he liked copyright in newspapers, and approved the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but that he did not like his plan. But that was the very question the Committee had to consider. The question before the Committee was not a mere question of abstract justice but of practical policy. A gentleman, now no more, was examined before the Committee, who, he believed, was at that time editor of The Daily News. He stated that the proprietors of that journal had reason to complain that, after they had been at great expense for the transmission of Indian news, the country papers had taken it from them without any acknowledgment, and he thought that a short copyright would put an end to such practices; or that, at any rate, their permission should be obtained. He (Mr. Gibson) recognised a sort of abstract justice in this claim, but he was perplexed as to how they were to act upon it. Before Parliament made a law to meet an evil, it ought to be satisfied that the evil was of sufficient magnitude to make a remedy necessary. The Electric Telegraph Company, of which the hon. Member for Stoke upon Trent (Mr. J. L. Ricardo) was Chairman, was charged that very day in The Times with acts of a piratical character, by selling news extracted from The Times to the local papers in the provinces. He would leave it to his hon. Friend to explain to the House the proceedings that had taken place under his presidency. But it appeared to him strange that if this operation was of so oppressive a nature, the London morning papers should now come forward for the first time to ask for a remedy. He should like to know whether the House would have heard anything about it if it had not been for the Newspaper Stamp Bill? If a copyright was proper to be had, the proprietors of newspapers ought to have it whether there was a stamp duty or not. The provincial papers took as much now from the London papers as they were ever likely to take; and, if it were necessary that they should be punished for that offence after this Bill should be passed, it was equally necessary that they should be punished now. But this clause was in reference to the pirates who were to come. They were possibly "looming in the distance." Let us wait and see whether they came or not. He was one of those who did not believe that there was this great army of pirates approaching against the London press. He was therefore prepared to abide his time, and see whether the emergency was so imminent as to necessitate this great change in their legislation. He doubted likewise whether, practically, it would be possible to accomplish the protection proposed for a narration of facts. It appeared to him from the article in The Times newspaper of that morning that they had great doubts themselves whether the Bill would be of any practical benefit to them. If it would be of no benefit to them—they being the parties who made the largest expenditure for news—it was clear that neither they nor any other London proprietors cared much about it. Indeed, they as much as said that if the halfpenny tax were only removed from their second supplements, the other newspapers might plunder them as much as they pleased. Thus, by the by, The Morning Chronicle, The Daily News, and all their other morning contemporaries, it appeared, might be plundered as well as themselves, if the cheap postage of 1d. for any size or weight were granted to The Times. Only concede this boon, and they would bid defiance to piracy. This apprehension of piracy, therefore, could not be very well founded. The editor of The Daily News, in his evidence, also stated, that nobody could complain if a provincial paper announced, as a fact, that a London journal said so and so. Now, here was a copy of the "morning express," which was sent down to Manchester that day by the hon. Member for Stoke upon Trent's company, and which was described as piratical:—

"9 a.m., April 30. The Post believes that despatches were received on Friday from General Canrobert, and on Saturday from Lord Raglan through the new submarine telegraph, stating that the bombardment of Sebastopol by the allies had not been attended with such success as to justify an assault."

Was the statement that The Post thought or believed that such and such a despatch had been received to be considered as piracy? Well, this was the form of the announcements generally made by the Electric Telegraph. They ran thus:—" The Times says so and so—that Sebastopol has been taken," for instance. These were matters the circulation of which it would be impossible to stop. The London correspondent of a country newspaper searched the contents of all the journals, and telegraphed down to the provincial editor such portions of the news published in the metropolis that morning as he thought fit. The provincial editor received his intelligence from his correspondent, but did not know whence the latter had obtained it. The correspondent was a collector of the news brought to London by The Times from Vienna or elsewhere; he telegraphed what he read and heard; and, therefore, to make a provincial editor personally responsible, merely because he inserted a paragraph communicated by an independent source, and which might have appeared in some London morning journal, would be perfectly monstrous. Again, the power of evasion would be so great that it would be impossible to enforce the law without creating all sorts of vexatious litigation—a consideration surely forming a valid argument against any new legislation. Literary publications were, no doubt, entitled to a copyright, if they contained a series of letters—“Mrs. Caudle’s Curtain Lectures,” for instance, or any other—provided the proprietors registered those particular compositions, which, being produced from the mind of some individual, were entitled to the same protection as books. The right, however, to narrate a fact, when that fact had been previously narrated by somebody else, was a totally different thing. It was to be hoped, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, seeing the difficulties incident to the subject which had occurred to the House, and considering that the danger sought to be guarded against was altogether prospective, would consent to postpone, for the present at least, the extension of a copyright to newspapers.

LORD LOVAINE said, that this was the first time in the history of this country when a copyright was asked for articles of the most ephemeral description, which were written one day and forgotten the next; and certainly if the press of our day needed this protection it must have become weaker than it used to be. Recollecting what the daily newspapers assumed to be their functions, how they controlled, or attempted to control, Ministers of State, and interfered even in the operations of the army, affording information to the enemy on points which it was of the highest importance should be concealed from him—in which reprehensible practice, according to the statement of a late Cabinet Minister, they could not be restrained—it was rather curious that they should come before the House at that particular moment in the attitude of suitors seeking a copyright as a protection. It was a question whether, according to the law of England, any man had a right in another’s wrong; for it was notorious that the press circulated calumnious accusations and vituperative charges against individuals who had no means of clearing themselves in the eyes of the public. Those charges were reiterated from day to day—some of them had even been repeated in that House in the face of the most solemn denial; and was it fitting that a right of property in articles of that character should be entitled to the protection of the law? Again, magistrates by the law of this country were not allowed to decide the commonest question of right—such matters must be referred to a jury; and yet in a case of this importance, where the newspapers exercised enormous and irresponsible powers, it was proposed that they should be permitted to go before such a summary tribunal to enforce their alleged rights. Why should not the persons whose characters were assailed and aspersed by the press have an equal right to go before a stipendiary magistrate, and obtain damages against the proprietor of the journal that had injured him? But further, it was the printer or publisher of a newspaper who was to sue for the penalty provided by this clause. Why should it not rather be the editor, the person who could prove by whom the articles the right involved in which was asserted were originally furnished? This Bill also proposed to relax the existing law for protecting private character from the anonymous libeller. Journalism in this country required the exercise of as much talent and ability as any other profession, and why, therefore, should not those who pursued it bonâ fide as an avocation do so boldly and openly before the world, claiming the credit and reputation due to them for the articles they contributed, instead of meanly skulking behind the shelter of anonymous writing? He would beg to propose the insertion after the words, “any colourable abridgment of the same,” of a proviso limiting the operation of the clause to such original articles, paragraphs, communications, &c., as were signed by and published under the true names of the writers, with the exception of articles from foreign countries relating wholly or partially to the public policy of such countries.

MR. CHAIRMAN said, that the noble Lord could not move his proviso until the Committee had decided whether the clause should be read a second time.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL : Sir, there are, no doubt, considerable difficulties involved in the question of a newspaper copyright ; but at the same time, it would have been very improper if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in introducing a measure like the present, had not attempted to deal with it. The subject is one which should be discussed upon its real merits, and stripped of all that species of misrepresentation in which hon. Gentlemen so much delight to indulge. There is nothing at all about news in the clause, and all these humorous statements which have been made represent that the clause is directed entirely to one object, whereas it is directed to another and a totally different one. If any one were desired to put his finger upon that portion of the literature of the present day in which, as a matter of composition, he may take a just pride, he might surely point to that which is called the ephemeral literature of the day—as if on that head it were less deserving of encouragement—and he would find that the greatest labour, expense, and anxiety are employed upon these sources of information. I desire hon. Members to ask themselves this question—is any one prepared to deny that, as soon as the change proposed by this Bill is effected, he does not expect that, day by day, a flood of publications will issue forth unstamped, paying no price for original matter, and feeding entirely upon the present established newspapers ? I will ask my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson) whether he does not expect that there will be established newspapers appearing within a few hours—probably within one or two—after the publication of the London newspapers, containing the most important articles and communications, which the London press has gathered with infinite labour and vast expense ? My attention has been directed to this subject from the personal experience I have had. Two or three years ago there was started a paper called The Politician, which appeared regularly every day, at half-past nine o'clock in the morning, and ready for the breakfast table. That paper consisted of all the leading articles in the morning newspapers, published some two or three hours earlier, and all the most important articles and statements of those papers. The newspapers combined in a body to put down that journal, but from the state of the law there was great difficulty in effecting that object, and I think it could hardly be accomplished. Now, what is the proposition of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer ? It is divided into two parts—first, the right of copyright which it gives ; and then the remedy that it applies. I certainly agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester with regard to the remedy, that a great deal may be said in opposition to it. But the same may be said of every proposal which desires to accomplish that which cannot be attained without the sacrifice of much that we have been in the habit of considering as necessary to justice. A prompt, speedy, and economical remedy is desired, and in proportion as we desire this we must give up much of the dignity and what we have been accustomed to connect with the due administration of justice. It is said in the clause that there shall be a property in every original article, letter, paragraph, communication, and composition which shall be for the first time published in every newspaper in this country. This clause is distorted by representing that it introduces the word “news.” This is the criterion of the offence :—

“If any person shall, within twenty-four hours after the first publication of any original article, letter, paragraph, communication, or composition in any such newspaper, print and publish any copy of such original article, letter, paragraph, communication, or composition, or of any material part thereof, or any colourable abridgment or alteration of the same.”

Now, the identity of the pirated copy with the original is to be ascertained in the same way as it is now ascertained with regard to larger and more costly publications—namely, by the identity with the language in which the communication is made. If the language of the original communication and that of the pirated copy are so plainly identical and so nearly resembling each other that it is impossible to mistake, that will be a common-sense criterion in the one case as in the other as to the fact of piracy having been committed. I am surprised to find my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. J. G. Phillimore) putting his finger upon the words “colourable abridgment,” because, if my hon. and learned Friend is conversant with the law, he would know that these are the words which enter into every expression of the law as it now stands on this subject. The remedy is one that my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Gibson) ought to be the last to object to, since it is taken from an Act framed by a Manchester Protectionist—I refer to the Act of Parliament brought in to protect copyright of design. Yet you have no difficulty in committing to a stipendiary magistrate, or two justices of the peace, the difficult question of copyright of design, while you have a difficulty in trusting these justices with the opportunity of detecting what every man of common sense could point out, the piracy of a paragraph or article allowed to be copyright, and allowing them to say whether the language is not the same, or whether the language of the one does not so nearly approach to the language of the other that it might be said the one is a piratical abridgment or a colourable imitation of the other. I think that any justice of the peace could discharge that duty, and that this is the proper occasion for not allowing the present state of the law to pass without alteration, and to introduce some improvement in the existing state of the law. I think my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done nothing more than his duty. If, however, the Committee should generally think that the public interests do not require him to proceed further, he will no doubt be content with having suggested the improvement, and will not further press it.

LORD STANLEY said, that after the last few words which had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, it was almost unnecessary to continue the discussion, because he thought they could pretty well conjecture what was the meaning of those words. The real point they had to consider was, whether they could draw a distinction between news and original matter in a newspaper. He did not imagine that on the principle of the clause there was any great difference of opinion between Members on any side of the House. They had admitted a copyright in books, whether published anonymously or otherwise: and they ought consequently to be prepared to admit a copyright in all original compositions properly registered, whether anonymous or no. On the other hand, he supposed it would not be affirmed that the mere circumstance of making public a fact which had already taken place was a fair subject for a copyright. The question was, whether they could, by any legislative ingenuity, draw a distinction between the statement and the comment, between the simple narrative and the inference founded upon that narrative. He had not heard from the supporters of the clause the slightest attempt to solve that problem, and for his part he believed it to be absolutely insoluble. Admitting that a copyright could be recognised in the case in which an article had been copied word for word, how could it be recognised in the case of a colourable change of an article? They could not trust to mere similarity of argument, or to mere identity of ideas upon questions which were at one and the same time engaging the attention of hundreds of thousands of persons in the country. In that House itself they found every day Members, completely unconnected with one another, striking out the same line of argument, and working out that argument very nearly in the same language. He (Lord Stanley) had the honour to be a magistrate, and he confessed he should feel extremely perplexed at being placed in so invidious a position as to be called upon to decide so intricate and complicated a question. If you were to give a copyright of twenty-four hours, what would be the result? He would suppose a case that he himself had written a letter to a morning paper, which he wished also to appear in an evening paper of the same day. Why he and the printer of the evening paper could be legally made amenable, as the clause now stood. If you could distinguish between news and original matter, which seemed to him to be impossible, he would support the principle of the clause; but the distinction seemed to him one impossible to be drawn: he thought, therefore, the clause, if passed into a law, could not be administered; and should oppose it accordingly.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he hoped that before the Chancellor of the Exchequer withdrew the clause, he would give the Committee an assurance that he would devote his best consideration to devising some mode of reconciling different opinions on this point. There were few persons who did not feel in their hearts that some alteration of the present law was needed.

MR. W. J. FOX said, that the great evil to be apprehended from the omission of some such clause as this from the Bill was, that the establishment of a cheap press, living piratically upon the existing newspapers, would lower the character of

English journals, and would destroy their superiority in obtaining extensive and accurate information, and in calling forth talent of the highest description for the public service. It could not possibly answer for newspapers to lay out large sums of money in obtaining intelligence from a considerable distance, if it were immediately to become the property of the public, or of individuals interposing between the public and the journal originally publishing it. The provincial papers, he considered, could not be deteriorated by the passing of the clause, as had been argued, for of course all the respectable provincial newspaper proprietors would make their arrangements with the London papers, who went to the expense of obtaining valuable intelligence. They would pay their fair share of the outlay so incurred, and it would be only fair that those who did not pay should go without the news until it became generally known to the inhabitants of the locality. The outlay for obtaining intelligence was enormous, and the sums paid for original compositions for our best newspapers were of very considerable amount; but what journal would consent to incur these heavy expenses if their best compositions could be immediately pirated by a swarm of cheap publications. Some time ago there was a weekly paper which made for itself a large circulation by getting early copies of all the other weekly papers, and transferring their best articles to its own pages. This no doubt would be the case with regard to the daily papers if the stamp were taken off, and the result would be a great falling off in that liberality and disposition to incur expense for intelligence or for talented compositions which now characterised our press. This would completely overbalance every advantage which the press might receive from the repeal of the stamp duty. At present the stamp duty did render it necessary that there should be a certain amount of capital and intelligence forthcoming for the establishment of a newspaper, and a certain degree of talent displayed in its management, but, without some such clause as this, all would be pulled down to one common level. Much had been said of the American journals; but he should be very sorry to see our journals brought down to their level, either in news, original composition, or in anything which conduced to the value and dignity of the press. With regard to anonymous writing, it was not generally from any desire on the part of the writers that such a system was adopted, but simply to suit the convenience of those arrangements by which several writers were made to co-operate together for one purpose, the editor or proprietor being put forward as the responsible person. It must not be forgotten that the letters of "Junius" were anonymous contributions to a newspaper; as were the letters of "Runnymede," which in their time had also produced considerable political effect. Coming to more recent times, was it not the articles in the press which had first created that impression on the public mind with respect to the conduct of the war which had called for and compelled the inquiry now in progress; and had it not been for the press, should we ever have had a chance of unravelling any of the causes by which our gallant army in the Crimea had been brought to so sad a pass? The country was under great obligations to the newspaper press, and its progress was an object which every Englishman ought to prize and endeavour to promote. With regard to the difficulties which it was said stood in the way of enforcing the law of copyright, these, he was of opinion, might be met. The legal opponents of the clause allowed its abstract justice, though why it should be called "abstract" justice he could not see, since it affected the pockets and interests of a large body of respectable persons. The Chairman of the Electric Telegraph Company (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), he perceived, was about to follow him, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman would tell them how his Company came by the news which it disseminated over the country. Was it their own agents who collected news for them at Vienna, and did they then communicate it to the leading journals? If it was not so, he did not see what greater right they had to make a profit of this news than a clerk in the Post Office would have to take advantage of the contents of any private letter which came under his notice; but if it were as he had described it, he could not sufficiently admire the generosity of the Company who spread so much news gratis throughout the country. He hoped some mode would be devised of establishing newspaper copyright, otherwise the House would inflict an injury on the press which would go far to destroy the benefit intended to be conferred on it by the abolition of the stamp.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he could not allow the insinuations contained in the latter part of the hon. Member's speech to pass without an immediate answer. The hon. Member seemed to think that the despatches which passed through the telegraph were intercepted by the Telegraph Company on their way to the papers, and used by them for their own purposes. Now, the principle on which the Electric Telegraph Company had always been conducted was, that every despatch intrusted to them was delivered to the person to whom it was addressed, without any one, except the clerk through whose hands it passed, being aware of its contents. So soon as any intelligence, received in any manner, was published in the newspapers, it was immediately transmitted by the Electric Telegraph Company to every part of the country. When the list of the killed and wounded at the battle of the Alma arrived in this country, before half an hour it was transmitted by the telegraph to every principal town in the United Kingdom—to Aberdeen and Glasgow on the one hand, and to Plymouth and Exeter on the other; and he should certainly look with very great alarm on the passing of any law to prevent the transmission to all parts of the country of news of such universal interest. The Electric Telegraph Company purchased a copy of The Times, in which such intelligence was recorded, and they telegraphed it down to every town in the country; but, if they were not to do that, if there were no telegraph, then The Times would be sent down five or six hours after, and the article itself would be extracted and posted in the Exchange-rooms, or wherever the place might be, just exactly in the same manner as it would have been had the Electric Telegraph Company transmitted it. The only difference was, that the public saw the intelligence some hours before they otherwise would do, and the injury done to the papers was the same; it was neither more nor less, and the public enjoyed all the benefit of the transmission by telegraph. It was a distinct rule with the Electric Telegraph Company, that nothing should be transmitted that had not been previously printed in the newspapers. The Company did not take on themselves the responsibility of transmitting anything on their own authority, but, as had been explained by the right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson), they stated that they transmitted from The Times, The Post, or The Herald, certain intelligence of great interest which the public ought to know at once. He thought that the Committee ought to pause, even if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not set them the example of pausing, before they passed any such law as that involved in the present clause. It was not for the interest of the Telegraph Company that this clause should not pass into law; he as a public man should vote against the clause, but, as far as his private interest as chairman of the Telegraph Company was concerned, nothing could be more advantageous than that this clause should pass, because the public must have intelligence, and if one corn merchant wanted the prices of wheat at London or Dantzig, others also must have it, and if the Company were not allowed to transmit from The Times the prices current, to take which, of course, under the present clause, would be piracy, in such a case each individual merchant would have to transmit a private message for the prices. This would be of great advantage to the Telegraph Company, but a great disadvantage to the commercial interests of the country. He did not share in the alarm of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. W. J. Fox), and he must confess that he could not understand why taking the stamp off rendered copyright protection necessary now if it was not necessary before. They had been told by the hon. and learned Solicitor General that Manchester would be flooded by a number of small newspapers containing the news of the London papers; but these small newspapers could not afford to have intelligence transmitted through the telegraph; they could only take it from the Manchester papers, which must, as at present, obtain their intelligence at some cost, and from them, at third, not first hand, the cheap papers would be obliged to take their intelligence. But, when the hon. Member for Oldham, in these days of penny encyclopedias and cheap publications, told them that because papers were cheap they must deteriorate the press of this country, and that their articles must be injurious, he (Mr. Ricardo) had mistaken the hon. Gentleman's liberality in these matters, for he apparently did not think cheapness compatible with utility. He (Mr. Ricardo), so far from thinking that this measure would render the periodical papers cheap and injurious to the morals of the people, believed nothing would tend more to elevate their morals. He believed, moreover, that the public could discriminate between what was good and what was bad. They were the best judges of what they ought or ought not to buy and to read, and it was not for that House to decide for them.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, speaking with more candour than courtesy, had disposed of all the arguments used on his (Mr. Bentinck's) side of the House against the clause, by stating that they were mere "misrepresentations which Gentlemen on that side of the House delighted to indulge in." Without troubling the House with a repetition of these arguments, he would tell the Solicitor General that it was he who had misrepresented the arguments used on his (Mr. Bentinck's) side of the House. The Solicitor General had also stated that part of the due administration of justice must be put on one side, in order to carry out this clause. This, coming from so high a legal authority, was a conclusive argument against the clause, and after such an admission there could be little doubt as to how the Committee would deal with it.

MR. BRIGHT said, the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Milnes) had by his notice on the paper raised so many puzzling questions for the Government, that he was afraid his hon. Friend wanted to coax them to try some other scheme, and he (Mr. Bright) had risen to express an opinion that, as the Government had already so many puzzling questions before them, they had better not unnecessarily involve themselves in another. The Committee, he believed, agreed that all persons who carried on, or were connected with, newspaper making, should do so in a way which would be remunerative to themselves, but it did not follow that it should be made remunerative by a clause so embarrassing as the present. If they took the paper which of all others had done most to circulate intelligence, which had expended the largest sums to obtain it, and which of all others was, from the value of its information, most liable to piracy, the House would find that there was no necessity for a clause of this kind, for it had been for years the most profitable business speculation that any number of men could have followed. He alluded, of course, to The Times. It had no reason to complain of this measure, neither had it made any complaint, but it had used this question as a leader to complain of something else which might be a grievance. At this moment, with The Times at 5d., surely, if there had been any chance of success, a paper could have been brought out at 2d., paying the stamp, and containing all that one desired to see; but such a paper could not be established, and, if it could, it could not restrict the sale of The Times. He (Mr. Bright) coming from Manchester, could not obtain The Times till he reached Rugby or Wolverton, and when in town, residing in St. James's Street, he could not obtain it till twelve or one o'clock, and one day, when he sent from his club to buy one, the news-vender told the boy he could not get a copy, and that he would give him 1s. for every copy he could obtain. Here, then, the House had a paper bringing news from all parts of the world, and nothing had hitherto withheld parties from pirating its leading articles and communications, publishing them in a paper at 2d., and paying the stamp. This had, indeed, been attempted by several papers, but had failed; one of them had been audacious enough to take an office next to The Times, but they did not let The Times know what they were going to do; and even made a contract to obtain steam from the boilers of The Times; so that they were going to obtain the steam of The Times in more senses than one. This paper, if it came out, did not last for many days, and he defied his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. W. J. Fox) to point out an instance in which an attempt of this kind had succeeded. They had heard a great deal said about the American papers, and he generally found that when Gentlemen were in a difficulty as to what they should say on this question, they always had a kick at the American papers; he was sorry that he had not with him a paper which he had at home, containing a list of 300 persons employed on The New York Tribune. They had no copyright in America, and they never heard any complaints of piracy from The New York Herald, The Courier, and other American papers; the whole thing was a delusion, the people liked to buy what they wanted at first hand—this was so in America, and would be the same in this country. The piracy question had been got up for the moment for the purpose of preventing Members of this House from looking with favour on the Bill brought in by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or that which was introduced by his predecessor the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). The last time he (Mr. Bright) addressed the House on this subject, he read a paragraph from The Globe, copied from a Cambridge paper, which was hot on the subject of piracy,

and it stated that those gentlemen who had been most concerned in the repeal of the stamp were preparing to bring out a paper, to engage in this buccaneering kind of business, and by inference charged him (Mr. Bright) and hon. Members who sat near him with this intention. The paragraph was placed in a prominent part of the paper, and everybody could see the indignation which existed in the mind of The Globe, if The Globe had a mind, as to the question of piracy, but he took the liberty on that occasion of pointing out to the House that The Globe was the most expeditious, universal, and incessant pirate they had in this country. This clause, if passed and carried, would suppress The Globe altogether; and what did The Globe say when it was proposed? It looked at the question then from an entirely different point of view. That paper published a leading article against this clause infinitely more forcible and more logical than anything it had said before in favour of such a provision, showing conclusively that the clause would be most injurious, and, if it were operative, most unjust. The concluding paragraph was very judicious, and entirely agreed with his view of this matter. The Globe said—

"Our own opinion is, that the reputation of journals for priority of intelligence, and originality and vigour of writing, will prove their best protection. There is no pirating such a reputation; and little fear from piracy for those journals which have not acquired it."

The Solicitor General had made some allusion to piracy which he said was being practised in the city of Manchester, and The Times of that morning had an article in which great indignation was evinced at a threepenny paper there which published news appearing in The Times. That paper was about the size of The Globe, and would no doubt be published at a lower price when the stamp was abolished; but he would undertake to say, there was no person connected with The Times who would declare that one single copy of that journal the less was sold in Manchester in consequence of these smaller papers which took portions of its news. It so happened that the paper in question had the news of the battle of the Alma just one day before it was published in London, and The Manchester Guardian, The Manchester Examiner, The Leeds Mercury, and papers of that class, frequently had very energetic and able correspondents in some portions of the Continent, so that it did not follow that because early news was published in Manchester it must necessarily, therefore, be taken from the London papers. A piece of intelligence appearing in the Manchester press might have come direct from Vienna, though it might be almost the same as that in The Times; and was The Times to be armed with power to send down to Manchester, and drag these respectable editors before two justices of the peace? The whole question had been torn to pieces, and shattered by the discussions which had taken place that evening; and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree with the Committee, and the Committee would agree with him, that the Bill should pass without any of these obnoxious clauses. He was satisfied that, if adopted, they would, if not inoperative, be injurious, and that next Session they would come before the House for repeal.

THE CHANCELLOR OR THE EXCHEQUER: I apprehend, Sir, there is no doubt that, by the law as it at present stands, newspapers do enjoy a copyright for the original articles and other paragraphs inserted by them. In law, I conceive, it makes no difference whether a publication is anonymous or appears with the name of the author. It is a new doctrine—new to me at least—which I have heard preached to-night, that it is necessary, in order to enjoy a copyright, that the name of the author should appear. Take, for instance, the case of an encyclopædia. An encyclopædia publishing anonymous articles unquestionably enjoys the same copyright as a poem, a history, or an original work published with the name of the author. It has, however, been found in practice that the greatest difficulties exist in enforcing the legal claim to copyright which a newspaper enjoys. A newspaper proprietor can neither, in effect, apply to a court of equity for an injunction to prevent the publication of an article, when that publication is so ephemeral, nor can he, with any probability of success, enter an action for damages. In introducing a measure, therefore, by which the number of cheap newspapers would be largely augmented, it was felt by Her Majesty's Government to be a matter of common justice to the proprietors of existing newspapers to give them an effectual remedy by which their present rights might be enforced. With that view the clause now under the consideration of the Committee was prepared and submitted to them, as it was thought but just to guard the rights and interests of existing newspapers. But, Sir, after the manner in which that proposition has been received on both sides of the House, I do not consider it is incumbent upon me to urge the matter further, and I shall not, therefore, press the clause upon the Committee. The object which I had in view was, that this question should be fairly considered by the Committee, that they might see what was the existing state of the law, and how far it met the circumstances of the case. If they believe that there is no danger of considerable abuse, and if they prefer to wait until the effect of the present measure has been felt and developed in practice, so as to see whether any additional remedies are needed, I can make no objection to that course, and therefore I shall not think it necessary to press this clause.

MR. DISRAELI: I am very glad, Sir, to hear the right hon. Gentleman has come to the conclusion of withdrawing the clause. He has told us that as the law now stands newspapers have a right to copyright. No doubt there are many rights which exist at present, but which are never asserted. There is the right of free warren, for instance. I know many individuals who possess that right, but I do not suppose there is any one who would exercise it. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bright) has spoken of our press as compared with the American press, and has alluded to the fears of those who apprehend that very injurious consequences are about to ensue to our press in consequence of this measure becoming law. Now, I believe myself that the tendency of this alteration in the law is to assimilate the press of this country to the American press. But the tone of the American press is not occasioned by laws of this kind, but that tone is lower than the tone of the English press because it is the press of a younger country, and, therefore, there are many influences at work in England which have elevated, and which will raise for a considerable time, the tone of the English press. But the tendency of this legislation is no doubt to lower the tone of the English press, because that tendency is to lower its enterprise, the amount of capital invested in it, and the degree of talent enlisted in the exercise of its functions. We have, however, at the present moment opportunities of counteracting to a certain degree what we may consider the injurious effects of the proposition of the Government in this particular case. I think we are bound, if we do not admit a copyright—and I am myself opposed to any such admission, because I think that, in the first place, it is on a great scale impossible, and in every respect vexatious—I say, I think we are bound to facilitate as much as possible the competition of the newspaper which invests and employs a larger capital, and which engages a greater amount of talent than all those journals which are in a very different and contrary position. My own opinion is, that the proposition of The Times newspaper, which has been alluded to this evening by one or two Members in a certain spirit of derision, is a just and sound proposition; and if you say that you will give no copyright to a newspaper at present existing, you are bound to facilitate in every possible manner its means of competition with all other journals which may pirate its news and its intellect. At the proper time, therefore, I shall support that Amendment which will propose that newspapers should circulate by the post without any limitation as to weight. I think, under these circumstances, you will be able to remove to some extent the injustice which must necessarily be committed, and which no one can doubt in theory exists as regards the newspaper which invests capital and engages talent, when placed in opposition to the journal which does neither the one nor the other. But, practically, will it happen that an established London newspaper existing on the present scale will suffer by this kind of competition? I doubt it. At the present moment—as has been remarked almost to surplusage in this discussion—the system of piracy exists. At a club you may receive information of what occurs in this House this very evening. You can get the condensed news of the debate there, but does that prevent you from taking in the morning paper which gives you that debate more at length and more authentically? The same thing occurs when you come to compare the circumstances of a distant town with those of the metropolis. The public will, depend upon it, always go to the fountain head. There is no possibility by any piracy, or by cribbing in the contemptible mode in which all these forms of larceny are executed, of your competing with the original article—that which appeals to your sentiment, your reason, and your sense of utility in a thousand ways in which the stolen article is deficient. And I feel persuaded that we shall not in the long run lower the tone of English journalism provided we study, by every possible means, to facilitate the communication of intelligence. I am asked to give a copyright in news. Now, my idea is, that it is my duty to facilitate the communication of intelligence, and, in order to facilitate the communication of intelligence, I must not give a copyright in news, but rather devise some mode by which intelligence can be circulated so that the largest number of people in the country can become acquainted with it. An hon. Gentleman, anticipating that the principle of copyright in newspaper literature might be conceded, has ventured to maintain that the only condition on which that principle ought to be conceded is, that no copyright should be allowed in the case of anonymous literary compositions. By the present law of England, we do not in point of fact give a copyright to an anonymous writer, because it is the possessor of a copyright, and not the creator of a copyright, who by our laws possesses a vested right in the composition. I am far from inclined to throw any discouragement upon the proposition of my noble Friend the Member for North Northumberland (Lord Lovaine); indeed, I have more than once had the pleasure of conversing with him on the subject. No doubt there is something that recommends itself to every manly mind in the principle that every one should be responsible for the sentiments he expresses, but if you come to practice, it is very doubtful whether you will be able to secure that result. What law can you devise by which you can secure that the writer of a leading article in a journal should certainly be known to every one who reads that article? You may pass a law making it incumbent that a name shall be signed to each article in a newspaper; but what name will appear? How can you secure that it will be the name of the writer? No doubt there are circumstances under which such a law would increase the authority of the press. The writer who bears an illustrious name would not hesitate to sign it, and thus increase the influence of the article and the circulation of the journal; but the writer who does not bear an illustrious name, though he may sign one that may become celebrated, will hesitate before he signs it; and you may have a formal and technical signature, but one utterly inoperative for the purpose you require, and the result will be far from bringing under your scrutiny and supervision the names of those you suspect or wish to become acquainted with. My noble Friend has spoken to-night of what he terms the calumnies of the public journals of this country. My noble Friend thought himself justified, no doubt, in the remarks he made, from certain circumstances which may be fresh in his mind and memory; but I think, on the whole, that my noble Friend expressed an opinion that cannot be justified with regard to the newspapers of this country. That they may be arrogant, that they may employ the liberty which, fortunately for this country, they possess, in a manner which some of us may often regret, is very possible; but that the general tendency of their labours is to maintain the public spirit of the country and to guard and uphold the public liberties, I think no impartial person can for a moment doubt. Several hon. Members, and particularly an hon. Gentleman opposite, have referred to-night to anonymous writing. Why, Sir, anonymous writing is not the exception, but it is the rule of the literature of this country. It does not apply to political literature alone, but it applies, on the contrary, to the whole of the literature of the country. Who wrote Thomas à Kempis? Nobody knows. Who wrote the Whole Duty of Man? Now, there is a book which every one of us ought to have studied—which for generations our predecessors have studied—which has had more editions than any book in the world, and which is not a scandalous book, a libellous book, or a political book, but which is an anonymous book. I noticed some anonymous works that occurred to me when the hon. Gentleman was speaking, and leaving the higher order of literature—religious literature—Thomas à Kempis and the Whole Duty of Man—let me ask who was the author of Waverley? An anonymous writer. Who was the author of Robinson Crusoe? An anonymous writer. Who was the author of A Vindication of Natural Society? Why, one who became afterwards one of the most brilliant ornaments of this House, to whom we are always referring as the most eloquent of orators, the most profound of sages, and if we mention him as a statesman it is only to abuse the Whigs for not having placed him in the Cabinet—I mean Mr. Burke. What are the most brilliant performances of political literature? What are those works that were written by one who in this House occupied the highest post, whose name will ever be remembered, and whose oratory,

though a tradition, still lives in the memory of the nation—I mean Lord Bolingbroke. What are Lord Bolingbroke's works? All those works which we are continually quoting are anonymous. When told of anonymous writing, I referred naturally to the most brilliant and permanent creations of the imagination—and I remembered that one of the finest poems in the English language—the Essay on Man—was an anonymous work. Really, therefore, when we remember these instances which have only this moment occurred to me, and recall the hundred other examples which might be collected, it is too absurd, in speaking of anonymous writing, merely to appeal to the leading articles of a newspaper, or to the political letters to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. I cannot help thinking that in effecting a very great change, which in its original conception I believe to have been just, but which, as applied by the present Government, seems to me to be uncertain, cumbersome, and unsatisfactory, we have in this instance to combat and meet a difficulty which it is in vain for us to cope with. We cannot give to the rumour, or to the whisper of the day or of the hour, even if authentic, the same permanent privileges which we would give to an epic poem or to one of those histories which are possessions for ever. We are bound to give to the communication of intelligence the utmost facilities which the law will permit, and the provisions of this Bill, which are to limit and restrict the circulation of newspapers or works, on which so much intelligence is expended, so much talent employed, and so much capital employed—the attempts to restrict the privileges of the Post Office according to the weight of the paper, by singling out the particular qualities which make it interesting to the multitude, are, I think, not to be tolerated. But while you assert that all the news a journal circulates, all the charms of thought or expression it may diffuse, cannot have that miserable privilege and monopoly of a few hours which has been suggested, while you assert that that would be incompatible with our civilisation and the age and manners in which we live, at the same time it is intolerable and not to be endured that we should by artificial restrictions hamper the circulation of intelligence. Let me impress upon the Committee that it is our interest that the newspapers in this country should be supported by the capital and fed by the intelligence of the country, because it is only by this mode that we can retain the superiority of the English press, and maintain that superiority over the American newspapers to which hon. Members have so often referred during this discussion.

LORD LOVAINE said, he must beg to explain that he had not proposed to compel the authors of any articles, except those who claimed the right which would be conferred by the present clause, to sign their names. No man was more ready than himself to acknowledge the talent which was displayed by the writers in the public press, but it was the maxim of English law that no man could have a right in another's wrong, and upon that principle he thought that leading articles in a newspaper which contained libellous matter upon individuals ought not to come within the protection of the law.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he did not think that the Essay on Man, referred to by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) was published anonymously, and as to Thomas à Kempis, he would beg to inform the right hon. Gentleman that it was written by Thomas à Kempis, the author of another treatise entitled De Imitatione Christi.

MR. DISRAELI said, he was sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman disagreed from him, but he had in his possession a copy of the first edition of the Essay on Man, and he could state that it was published anonymously. Who Thomas à Kempis was he thought no one had ever known, but if the hon. and learned Gentleman could inform him he would be much obliged for the information.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he would now beg to bring forward the clause of which he had given notice. He felt himself in a peculiarly difficult position in moving this clause, because his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had, in dealing with another subject, anticipated almost everything he had intended to say with regard to it, and compelled him in a great measure to rely upon his arguments. The immediate object of the clause which he held in his hand was to take as the measure which might be transmitted through the post for 1d. a standard rather above that of the paper which had the largest circulation. He might be asked why he had chosen dimension rather than weight. To that he would reply that in such cases weight was uncertain, and if the Act became one of a permanent character, under the competition which it might give rise to there might arise circumstances connected with the manufacture of paper itself which would render weight no criterion as to the amount of matter contained, and he had, therefore, felt it to be his duty to shape this clause in accordance with the 17th of Victoria, cap. 3. He found that his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he brought in a Bill to alter the Stamp Act, had thought that it was only justice to take as the measure for transmission by post the dimensions of the largest paper then in circulation, and he (Mr. Milnes) now asked the Committee, in altering the present law, to take as the measure of dimension the largest paper at present in circulation. It had been said that it would be much better not to enter on the question of weight or dimension, but to allow any daily paper to be transmitted by post for 1d., without regard to its weight or size; and it had been argued that by confining that concession to the daily papers it would be without the range of possibility that any very extraordinary weight would be imposed upon the Post Office. In reply to that opinion, the argumentum ad absurdum had been used, and it had been asked whether, if the editor of a newspaper chose to wrap himself up in a copy of his own journal, he would be conveyed through the Post Office for 1d.; but the argument which really most weighed with him was, that he did not see how such a concession could be made to the daily papers alone without acting most injuriously and unjustly upon and against the provincial and weekly papers, and upon that consideration he had felt that he could not fairly argue the question upon the ground of conveying the daily papers through the post for 1d. without any limitation whatever as to their size. He hoped that the Government would not have any objection to lay it down as a principle that the daily papers of the metropolis, which had by their diligence, exertion, and ability raised themselves to the position of distributing over the whole length and breadth of the kingdom an amount of intellectual matter never produced in the same way in any other nation, should enjoy a full share of justice, and that their chances of circulation should not be diminished at a moment when power was being given to very large papers to circulate an unlimited number of copies within a certain radius without going to the expense of a stamp. This was, he thought, a matter of simple justice to newspapers which Members of that House had become accustomed to look upon almost as political rivals, and of which it was impossible, however one might disagree from the principles contained in them, to think without respect. All that those papers asked for was, that they should not be placed in an unfair position, but that they should be allowed a reasonable chance of keeping up the high intellectual position which they now enjoyed. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) stated the other day that the question of weight was at present so nicely balanced that the railways were unable to carry into the country by the early trains a complete supply of The Times; that portion of the paper containing news being sent by the early trains, and the supplement by later trains. He (Mr. Milnes) had made inquiries on the subject, and he found that, though the fact was true, the inference was entirely false. The question was one depending altogether upon the manipulation of newspapers; and now, when the circulation of newspapers was so considerably increased, in consequence of the war, the difficulty of manipulating the large number of The Times required to be transmitted by the early trains was too great to be overcome, and it was solely on this account, and not in consequence of the excessive weight, that one portion of the paper was conveyed by one train and the remaining portion by another. He did not think that, if the present Bill should be passed, it would have the effect of destroying or even seriously injuring the great metropolitan journals, for he believed they had sufficient energy and power to overcome any difficulties to which they might be subjected by the measure. Hon. Gentlemen were aware that when, during the last century, a penny stamp was imposed upon periodicals, it was predicted that such publications would be destroyed; but the Spectator, though shaken temporarily, not only survived the blow, but rose with redoubled vigour; and in the very last article, in the seventh volume of the Spectator, Sir Richard Steele congratulated himself that that paper, by the buoyancy of its own merit, had attained an enormous circulation in defiance of the stamp. Although, however, the Spectator of that day, and the best periodicals of the present day, might possibly survive such an injury, it was impossible to avoid the reflection that the Spectator might have had a tenfold circulation if it had not been subjected to that stamp. He had no doubt the newspapers of the present day would derive great advantage from the abolition of the stamp which now limited their circulation, and he asked the Committee, as a matter of public policy and justice, to assent to his proposal. He did not ask a privilege for one newspaper or another, but he asked them to enable every newspaper, metropolitan or provincial, to rise to the same height of intellectual merit, to deserve the same public attention, and to exercise the same influence over the country as had been attained and were exercised by the leading journals of the metropolis. He asked them to assent to his proposal in recognition of the merit of those great newspapers which formed their daily delight. If they neglected this opportunity they might have cause for permanent regret hereafter, when they discovered that they had destroyed or damaged an important means of promoting the intellectual advancement of the country.

"Every periodical publication that shall be printed and published at intervals not exceeding seven days between the two consecutive parts or numbers of such publication, and the superficies of which shall not exceed three thousand five hundred inches of printed matter, shall be entitled to the said privilege of transmission and re-transmission by the Post, if duly stamped with the appropriate die of one penny: Provided always, That such publication shall be subject to the terms and conditions imposed in the third Clause of this Act."

MR. COWAN said, he thought he owed an apology, or at least an explanation, to the Committee for not having pressed the Amendments of which he had given notice. Having found, however, that those Amendments were unpalatable to the Government, that they were objected to by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone), and also by the noble Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), whose manly and independent conduct on this question did him great credit, he felt it would have been very unwise on his part if he had pressed them upon the attention of the Committee. He thought, considering the various parties whose interests were affected, and taking into account also the transition state of the Post Office in connection with the duties it was called upon to discharge, that that House was a very unfit tribunal to determine what amount of weight or charge should be fixed, and that the subject was one which should be left to the decision of the Executive Government. He imagined that the Government would not be disposed to assent to the Motion of the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) now under the consideration of the Committee, which seemed to be based upon the assumption that the State must convey by post any amount of weight. There were newspapers in existence, such as The Illustrated London News, with its supplements, which weighed as much as ten ounces, and if the Committee agreed that newspapers of the dimensions of 3,500 inches should be carried at a rate of one penny, he did not see why they should not go a step further, and convey such papers as The Illustrated London News at the same rate. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the enormous weight of newspapers the Post Office now carried, as contrasted with what was the case forty or fifty years ago. He found, from an article in The European Magazine of 1808, that the number of newspapers in England in 1782 was fifty-two; in 1790, sixty; and in 1801, 135. The number of newspapers in Scotland in these respective years was eight, seven, and thirty-one; and in Ireland, three, nine, and fifty-six. The circulation of the London morning papers in 1808 was 16,000; of evening papers, 14,000; of Sunday papers, 25,000; of weekly papers, 20,000; and of others, 10,000; making, as the writer of the article observed, the "enormous number" of 85,000 newspapers, using five tons of paper in the course of a week. There was another article on the subject in The European Magazine of 1822, when the circulation of The Times was stated to be 5,700. The average daily circulation of that journal at the present time was stated to be 60,000. The circulation of The Observer in 1822 was stated to be 6,860, of The Morning Chronicle 3,180, and of The St. James's Chronicle 3,700; and the writer of the article, after referring to the circulation of other journals, goes on to observe that the result presented an extraordinary proof of the activity of the periodical press. How would the writer have been astonished if he had seen the progress that had been since made in extending the circulation of the newspapers! Instead of the consumption of paper by the London press being five tons a week, as was the case in 1808, it was morning papers, which supplied the great mass of information, to a most severe and unfair competition, though he had no sympathy with the feelings of the proprietors of country newspapers, who had petitioned the House in a sort of Protectionist spirit. He thought there was no justice in their complaint, and was glad the House had not listened to it, but if they recognised the principle of treating newspapers invariably in the Post Office, they ought not to violate that principle in the case of the largest newspaper, employing the most capital, and from whose labours and expenditure the public derived the greatest benefits. He did not ask them for a copyright, for he never wished to see one; but he did think, when they were imposing a postage upon newspapers, the question they ought to consider should not be so much a question of simple postage as of imposing it equally on all. It was of the greatest consequence that the newspapers of the country should be kept up to the high standard at which they now confessedly stood, and the way to keep them up would be to allow those newspapers upon which the most money and the greater talent were expended to circulate in the country districts with as much freedom and as little expense as possible. He asked for bare justice, and he would only add, as an allusion had been made to hon. Members truckling to the press, that if it would ill become hon. Members to truckle to the press, still less would it become the press to truckle to hon. Members.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: I had some difficulty, Sir, in understanding precisely what the proposition was, until I heard the hon. Member who has just sat down. It is simply this: that there is a case for relief to The Times newspaper—I do not know that any other large paper was mentioned—in respect to transmission through the post; and that whereas The Times, with its double supplement full of most profitable advertisements—now pays a freight of 1½d. for carriage through the post, for the future it shall only pay for the carriage of the same profitable cargo the sum of 1d. In other words, that ¼d. shall be deducted from the public revenue. I ask the Committee, is this a case for relief? Now, I am prepared to make this proposition to The Times. I will pay that ¼d. freely for the extra sheet of advertisements, if they will give to me the money which they receive from their advertising connection. I will bind myself legally to that bargain—

to pay the ¼d., if I may receive the money paid for advertisements. There is no doubt it is a great benefit to the public that the Post Office should carry what the public wants as cheaply as possible; but I contend that we must have regard to what can be done in the way of cheapness, and that we are not to tax the public to carry The Times newspaper, or any other paper, by offering to do it at a less charge than it costs. If we can carry a periodical publication the size of The Times and its double supplement for 1d. without loss, we can carry all other publications of the same weight and the same size without loss; because the Post Office cannot take into consideration the contents, but merely the weight and the bulk. And, therefore, there can be no loss in carrying all, if we can carry The Times without loss at this rate. Then, I ask my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Milnes), why does he not propose to carry all? And if he cannot carry all, I say, why is the public to be taxed to carry a large newspaper full of profitable advertisements? What has been the course in reference to The Times newspaper? I am prepared to carry it at the lowest possible charge at which it can be carried, so as to cover the costs to the public. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer took the stamp off the first supplement to The Times. Formerly The Times and a single supplement had to pay a tax of 1½d. to go through the post; and not only that, but, in order to have the postal privilege, it was required to pay the 1½d. upon its whole impression. For the future, only those particular copies that go through the post will have to pay the tax; and that is a considerable relief, by exempting a large proportion of the impression from that duty. The return of ¼d. stamps, only issued during 1854, gave something over a total amount of 20,000l. a year. Well, that stamp was taken off; nobody objected to it; but what was the effect? Did the public get any benefit? Did not everybody pay 5d. for The Times as usual? Was the expense of printing The Times, of getting it up, or collecting the news, greater than before? Not at all. If they paid the same, and got the same price for their paper, where, I want to know, went this 20,000l. a year? I say that that was a great boon to The Times. It was granted; nobody objected. But when they come here and tell us that The Times newspaper is injured, and has a claim for relief, I say it is a monstrous appeal, and that this House most unjust. Or was it proposed to carry this principle to all printed matter and to all private documents? [Mr. MILNES: No.] Then it would be unnecessary for him to argue that question. But let the Committee recollect that a letter weighing under half an ounce was sent for 1d., while the largest newspaper printed, and weighing nearly six ounces, was to be sent also for 1d., according to the proposition of his hon. Friend. Thus the privilege given to the newspaper was twelve times greater than that given to the letter, and, in addition, there would be the privilege of retransmission. The newspaper might pass six times through the Post Office in the week; and these two being multiplied—the weight by the quantity—it would be found that we were conferring on the newspaper seventy-two times the amount of postal privilege we were conferring on the letter. He did not see any argument of justice or sound policy that could be urged in favour of such a proposal as that. If he were asked what principle ought to be acted upon in the matter, he should have no hesitation in laying it down, with this qualification in practice, that they had to deal with vested interests, and that at the present moment they could not afford to incur any unnecessary loss of revenue. The fair principle, he thought, was this—to carry a certain quantity, say four ounces, of all matter, whether printed or manuscript, for the same sum of 1d. Let there be no distinction between printed matter and manuscript letters, but let them all be carried equally at the same rate. He was speaking of what, in justice, ought to be done; but in dealing with the subject, under present circumstances, we must remember that we could not afford to lose any revenue—though, if we came to argue that point, it might be found that the additional revenue derived from letters weighing upwards of half an ounce was less than might be supposed, and, therefore, that that difficulty might not be so formidable as some people imagined. For the present, however, they must leave the postage of letters alone, anomalous as it might be. We should also have to tolerate another anomaly, and that was the privilege of retransmission. Already we were sending eight times the weight of newspaper matter through the post for the same price at which we sent manuscript matter under half an ounce, and that eight-fold advantage we added to by sending the newspapers during the week for as many times as their owners pleased. He thought, therefore, that sufficient allowance had already been made for the interests of journalism, and that, if these privileges were further extended, the Committee would only be stultifying former legislation by re-enacting privileges which they had only a few weeks before formally abolished.

MR. LOWE said, he was sure that the Committee would believe him when he stated that he ventured to address them upon this subject with great reluctance, and that he should not be induced to do so did he not believe that he could give them some little information with regard to it. He apprehended the principle on which they were to decide this question was not that laid down by the noble Lord who had last addressed them. The noble Lord had argued the question as if they were about to establish a totally new principle for the conveyance of printed and written matter through the Post Office. It might or might not be right for the House of Commons to do so, but he would not enter into that subject, because it was not the question before them. The question simply was whether 1d. should be the amount of postage to be charged upon a certain quantity of matter published at intervals within a certain date? Whether that were just or unjust depended materially upon the principle which was applied in viewing the question, and he submitted that it should not be the principle which had been laid down by the noble Lord. It could hardly have escaped the Committee, and the noble Lord must himself have felt it, that his argument suffered from some amount of inconsistency, because the noble Lord was very much shocked at the disparity of carrying six ounces of a newspaper for 1d. and a letter, under half an ounce, for the same amount; but the noble Lord was not shocked at the disparity, almost equally startling, of carrying four ounces and half an ounce for 1d. They must fix upon a principle, however, and apply it strictly, fairly, and logically. The noble Lord's principle would appear to be to treat newspapers and letters as the same, and to apply the same rule of postage by weight to all. He did not gather how the noble Lord intended to accomplish this; but, if he might be allowed the phrase, he thought that the proposition was "practically impracticable." If the noble Lord took letters as his guide, he would impose a rate upon newspapers, which, however just according to the noble Lord's abstract theory, would to it for a knowledge of those things which were enacted in the Crimea, the representation of which given in The Times was not overcharged ; but only served to raise the veil under which such a mass of cruelty and mismanagement was concealed. He was disposed to think that the increased charge proposed to be put on The Times would, by checking the transmission of that paper through the post, cause a loss to the Post Office revenue.

MR. WARNER said, he must protest against the idea that the Post Office had anything to gain by the conveyance of newspapers. It was only in consequence of the legislation of past years, creating a sort of vested right in existing newspapers to be carried by the post, that the present arrangements could be defended. At the same time, he thought it would be a great injustice to attempt to tax a large paper more than a smaller one.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he feared that, if the proposition of the hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Lowe), that a uniform principle should be applied to the postage of newspapers and other articles carried through the post were practically enforced, nearly the whole of the present system would have to be abolished. If they compared the rates of charges on letters, newspapers, books, and other printed publications, not being newspapers, they would find the discrepancy so great that, if it should be the pleasure of Parliament to reduce them to a uniform scale, it would be necessary to sweep away all existing rates, and commence de novo. The Bill before the Committee was, therefore, limited to carrying into effect, with the smallest possible alteration of the existing law, what he had understood to be the desire and wish of the House, namely, that the compulsory newspaper stamp should be converted into an optional one. In framing the Bill, then, all the existing anomalies—to which he was by no means blind—had been retained, and the Bill was founded on the maintenance of the existing law with respect to superficial inches, the rule being that a newspaper on one or two sheets might contain a superficies of 2,295 inches for a stamp of 1d., and any number of additional supplements, containing 1,148 superficial inches, at the rate of one halfpenny stamp for each. The rule now in existence was the result of legislation two years ago, by which the charge on newspapers had been diminished, a penny stamp being substituted where stamps to the amount of three-halfpence were before necessary. The effect of the measure now before the Committee would be, that the proprietor of any newspaper would be at liberty to stamp what portion of the circulation of his paper he thought fit ; and, with respect to the remainder of the impression, it might be circulated through the post, but not without the impression of a stamp. This change in the law would confer considerable benefit upon all existing newspapers, namely, a relief from the charge of a compulsory stamp upon a considerable portion of their circulation, and they would also be otherwise benefited by the measure before the Committee. His hon. Friend proposed that they should alter the present law as to the limit of superficial inches, and that with respect, not to all periodical publications which were included in this measure, but with respect to others published at intervals not exceeding seven days, they should raise the limit carried by 1d. to 3,500 inches. There was nothing said in the clause with regard to anything beyond that limit, and he did not understand what it was proposed should be the charge upon a newspaper which exceeded 3,500 superficial inches. He could understand the argument that a newspaper should be treated as one publication, that a charge of 1d. should carry a newspaper, whatever its size might be, and that all the present rules with regard to superficial inches should be abolished ; but that was not the proposition now before the Committee. It was simply a proposition, for which no particular reason had been assigned, to raise the limit carried by 1d. from 2,295 to 3,500 inches. As far as he could gather from the speech of his hon. Friend (Mr. M. Milnes), no specific reason was given for that particular limit, except that it was rather more than the present limit, and would include some newspapers which were not now included ; but it would exclude other newspapers which printed a greater quantity of matter than 3,500 inches. He must say, therefore, that unless the Committee were prepared to throw aside that jealousy with regard to revenue which had been expressed in many quarters upon the second reading of this Bill—unless they were prepared not only to sacrifice that portion of the revenue which would necessarily be lost by the abolition of the compulsory stamp, but also that further portion which would be sacrificed by an offer on the part of the public to carry at a lower rate a greater weight and quantity than were carried at present, there seemed no reason to alter the existing law. One other argument had been adduced in favour of an alteration of the law, to which he would shortly call the attention of the Committee. It had been urged that as a portion of a newspaper was given gratuitously to the subscribers, as no additional charge was made beyond a certain weight or a certain number of superficial inches, it was therefore unreasonable that an additional charge in respect of that portion should be made by the Post Office. But the question as between the newspaper and its customers with regard to price was wholly indifferent to the Post Office; all that the Post Office looked to was the bulk and the weight of the article conveyed. It was utterly indifferent to the Post Office what the price might be, or whether the article bore any price at all, or was given away gratuitously, as was the case with certain newspapers which consisted wholly of advertisements, and were sent to Members of this House, and circulated merely for the sake of giving currency to those advertisements. With regard to newspapers of that sort, the Post Office was put to identically the same trouble and expense as if it were conveying the most highly priced newspaper, as their weight was the same, and they occupied the same amount of space; therefore the argument derived from the gratuitous distribution of a portion of a newspaper containing the advertisement sheets, which, being uninteresting to the majority of readers, did not occasion a corresponding increase of price, proved, when examined, to be totally destitute of foundation. Newspapers at present enjoyed a most remarkable privilege with regard to transmission by the Post Office as compared with other printed matter and with letters; they were now in an extremely favourable position with regard to the charges for their transmission, and if any attempt were made to render the system more uniform, such a change would redound, not to the advantage, but to the detriment of newspapers. At the same time he admitted that the present system was full of anomalies, and if it were reduced to uniform and consistent principles it must necessarily undergo a considerable change. The change now under consideration was limited to a single point, and he would strongly urge upon the Committee to allow this measure to pass and to see the effect it produced—and he admitted that it would operate a change of great magnitude and importance—before they embarked in other and different changes. If at some future time it should appear that the law did not work well, they would then approach its improvement with the advantage of knowing by experience what had been the effect of the measure they were now about to pass.

MR. DRUMMOND said, the right hon. Gentleman had told them they were about to try an experiment, but he thought it was an experiment which would be tried at the expense of a single establishment. He had objected the other day to the whole conduct of the press, because it was a system of stabbing in the dark, but he equally objected to that House stabbing that establishment in the dark; for there could be no question, after the debate which had taken place, that this was an attack upon a single establishment. If they passed a law burdening one cotton manufactory which produced a greater quantity of cotton than another, they made a direct attack upon that individual manufactory; and this was a precisely similar case. They were going upon a very dangerous principle; they were beginning to indulge private pique under pretence of public virtue. They attacked The Times—they were afraid of it; go where they might, upon what railway they pleased, every man was reading and abusing The Times; but, instead of standing up boldly against it, they gave it this dirty stab in the dark. They pretended that it was of immense importance to preserve the good and able writing which appeared in The Times; how was it preserved? It was preserved simply by that newspaper being a very profitable concern; but if they lowered the profit of the concern it could not employ able men to write in it, and it would dwindle down to the same twaddle as the Morning Herald. He would endeavour to do justice even to an enemy, and he should, therefore, vote against what he thought was a private attack, under pretence of public virtue, against a single establishment.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES, in reply, said, he should take the sense of the Committee upon his proposition. He would only remind them that the strongest and most vigorous speaker who had opposed it in this debate had been that hon. Member who had raised himself to a pinnacle of great public renown under pretence that he, more than any other man, advocated the cheap and free transmission of newspapers—that he, above all others, wished that the best newspapers should circulate through all grades of society, extending to all classes the advantages which newspaper reading conferred ; but who had also opposed, upon a former night, the transmission of newspapers for a halfpenny.

Motion made and Question put, " That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 86; Noes 260 : Majority 174.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he wished to know whether the provisions of the existing Act, which required securities from newspapers, would be applicable to any new description of newspaper that might hereafter be published under the provisions of the present Bill ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if he understood correctly the Act to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred, its provisions would extend to all newspapers, both stamped and unstamped.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought it would be better for the public to set out in the Bill, when it should be in a state in which it would be safe for the House to pass it, a clause making it apply to all newspapers.

The Preamble was then agreed to, and the House resumed.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, May 1, 1855.

MINUTES.] Took the Oaths.—The Lord Bishop of Meath.
Public Bill.—1st Loan.

FEES IN THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

LORD LYNDHURST begged to call the attention of his noble Friend on the woolsack to a subject of great importance to solicitors, and not less so to the suitors of the Court of Chancery. The matter was rendered of still more importance in consequence of a Bill now pending in the other House of Parliament, which would add a very extensive jurisdiction to the already extensive jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. The subject was that of fees paid to solicitors in the Court of Chancery. He was told that his noble Friend on the woolsack was about to institute some investigation on the subject, and to introduce some alteration ; and if that were so, he (Lord Lyndhurst) should not then give notice of Motion on the subject, as he had intended, but await the result of the inquiry. He wished to know from his noble Friend whether the fact was as he had stated ; and if so, who were the persons to whom the investigation was to be confided ?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the only error into which his noble and learned Friend had fallen was, that he supposed he (the Lord Chancellor) was about to institute an investigation ; but the fact was, that he had already set such investigation on foot. He felt the subject was one of extreme importance. It was of importance to the solicitors, and it was not less so, as his noble Friend had stated, but in fact more important, to the suitors of the Court. That the solicitors were placed in a position that was unsatisfactory no one could doubt, but it was always found that, unsatisfactory as the present was proved to be, it was difficult to discover another that would be more satisfactory. But from time to time certain alterations had been made ; and some months ago he requested the Master of the Rolls, who took an interest in the matter, to look into the subject, and see if he could suggest any improvement. The Master of the Rolls had done so, and having consulted various solicitors, he made a report, which he (the Lord Chancellor) received about two weeks ago, on the first day of term. He found from that report that the Master of the Rolls had investigated the subject very closely, but, hampered as he was with other business, he (the Lord Chancellor) did not like to ask him to pursue the inquiry further. The Master of the Rolls, indeed, said he had so many matters in hand that, although he would not shrink from the investigation, he would rather be released from it. He then had recourse to Lord Justice Turner and Vice Chancellor Wood, and put a paper into their hands, and had a conversation with them on the subject. These learned persons had very kindly undertaken to make the investigation, and he had united with them one of the Taxing Masters—he thought it was Master Follett—and put him in communication with them. He had also joined with them Master Wharton, one of the Masters of the Court of Exchequer, and a gentleman of whom it was impossible to speak too highly—and they had told him, that without any formal commission being issued, they would examine into the matter, and see if they could make any improvement in the scale of fees, or devise any manuer in which the scale could be arranged.

THE WAR—FLOATING BATTERIES.

EARL TALBOT said, he understood great doubts had been expressed with regard to the efficiency of the floating batteries recently prepared—first, with reference to their construction, and next, in regard to the effect that might be produced upon them by the shot and shell of the enemy. He wished to ask the noble Lord at the head of the War Department who was the designer of the floating batteries which were being built for Her Majesty's service, and if the project had been submitted to any scientific men or to the Surveyor General of the navy; and, also, if any experiment had been made with a view of testing the efficacy of the plates with which those batteries were constructed in resisting shot?

LORD PANMURE said, that the object of the batteries to which the noble Earl had referred was to enable naval armaments to be brought in contact with stone fortifications. He was not able to say who was the projector of them, but experiments had been made with shot at a short distance upon plates formed in a similar way to those with which those batteries were constructed, and the success of those experiments was such as to justify the Government in ordering a certain number to be built. The opinion of the public seemed to be unfavourable with regard to their utility, but he trusted that they would prove to be more successful than appeared to be generally expected.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE thought it was hardly possible to receive a more unsatisfactory answer to a question than that which had been given by the noble Lord opposite. He was aware that questions of this kind were not generally palatable, and there might be details which it would be for the interest of the country not to enter into at present. He agreed with the noble Lord that this was a great experiment they were about to try, namely, to ascertain the effect of shot upon iron plated vessels, and it must be considered that it was one of great interest. It had been arranged to construct in this country a certain number of these vessels, and he understood that the Emperor of the French was also to construct a similar number. It did not matter who was the designer of these batteries, but there was a question involved which affected the finances of the country and the success of the experiment, and they should all feel certain, whoever was the designer of the general system, that, at all events, the science of the country had been applied to the construction of these vessels. He had on that day proceeded to Woolwich to inspect two of these ships, and, without referring to the opinion of any other person, he would venture to state what his own opinion was with regard to the construction of these vessels. He would entirely put out of the question the beauty of form, because that was not a matter of importance, merely observing that nothing could be more unsightly than they were; they were entirely flat-sided, and that description of form he thought would do extremely well, and be very appropriate. He would put entirely out of sight, also, their powers of speed and of locomotion, and would merely deal with them as floating batteries that were to be transported to some distant region as a means of attack on fortresses. He took the trouble to measure the distance of the lower sill of the midship port from the water line in one of these ships, and when he did so, she had only on board her engines, empty boilers, and masts—she had no guns, or stores, or a single thing of any description, and was completely swept—and yet the lower sill was only 4 feet 6 inches from the water's edge, and her future immersion he could not calculate at less than 1 foot when she had received the whole of her cargo—shot, shell, ammunition, and water. If they allowed an immersion of 1 foot, and that he considered was the smallest that could be allowed, that would bring the lower sill within 3 feet 6 inches of the water's edge. He ventured to assert that that distance of the lower sill from the water was not a safe distance, and they must have the guns secured and the ports caulked for the purpose of transporting her to the Baltic. It appeared that the application of science had been omitted, for she might have been a better vessel, with a larger power of flotation; and he would venture to say that she was a failure with respect to her powers of flotation. This consequence would also arise, namely, that she would draw more water than was intended. The second point that must strike the beholder was, that the iron plates by which her sides were covered were so placed that they touched each other. They were  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches thick. They touched each other throughout, and anybody who knew anything of the expansion and contraction of iron must know perfectly well that it was always in motion. With the sun shining upon it, the expansion of iron was enormous, and it contracted at night. Those plates ought not to touch; they should be a distance of at least half an inch apart, and by that precaution they would have space for expansion and contraction. The effect of the mode of construction that had been adopted would be to loosen the plates when they were brought under the fire of a heavy battery; those plates, being malleable, would suffer in the way that iron did under the hammer on the anvil, and would begin to move about. They would spread with the blows, and would be broken, in all probability. The plates should be placed at a small distance from each other, to prevent the possibility of expansion or contraction acting detrimentally, and that would also prevent the effect of the blow from doing injury to the plate itself. These points appear to have been entirely overlooked, and science had been altogether neglected in the construction of these vessels—the power of flotation was not sufficient, and the treatment of the metal had not been proper. The neglect of all scientific precaution was even more apparent when he looked at these vessels as the means of inflicting serious injury upon an enemy. There was no contrivance, for instance, for protecting the men on the upper deck from those whom they were assailing. No doubt, it had been intended originally to cover the decks with iron, but he apprehended—owing to their small power of flotation—that the builders had not ventured to do so. The consequence was that a parabolic shell, if sent against them, would go completely through them. There was no protection whatever afforded to the men at the wheel, or to the officers who were to conduct the operations on board; and there were numerous other matters of detail which appeared to have been wholly overlooked. The means of working the cables, for example, were remarkably defective, those at one end being adapted in a different mode from those at the other. He would not enter into all these details, but they all went to show that science had been neglected in the construction of these vessels. Looking seriously at all these matters, he was driven to the conclusion that there was a deficiency of science in the naval departments of this country. Circumstances which went to prove this occurred nearly every day. A short time since he had alluded to the upsetting of a vessel, owing to the centre of gravity being too high; and, in order to remedy that defect, the authorities had sacrificed 250 tons of floating power by fixing that weight of asphalte in her bottom. He believed that there existed knowledge and zeal in the naval department of this country, but there was also something existing which rendered that knowledge and zeal nugatory, much to the detriment of the naval service.

EARL GREY regretted that his noble and gallant Friend should have considered it necessary to enter into this question at so much length; for, although he quite agreed that if a mistake had been made by the Admiralty, or there were grounds for believing that there was a want of scientific skill in the general conduct of any portion of the business of that department, it was a very fit subject to bring under their Lordships' notice, he must say that, while experiments or improvements were in progress, discussions and criticisms in their Lordships' House did not very much tend to facilitate their completion, or enable the department to bring them to any practical result. The Government were very properly held responsible for the success or failure of their measures, and, if they were to continue to be held responsible, they ought, in common fairness, to be allowed a degree of freedom in taking such measures as they thought fit; which it was quite impossible they could obtain, if, while they were engaged in conducting the business of that department and their measures were still in progress, noble Lords should come down to that House, and before the utility of any measure had been practically tested and its wisdom established, state their views of the disadvantages or advantages of the particular plan adopted by Her Majesty's Government, and enter into a long explanation of its various points. Such a course was the more objectionable, for it was perfectly clear, from the observations of his noble Friend, that he could not enter into a discussion upon the subject, and detail the various inspections which he had made of these floating batteries, without giving information as to the mode of their construction, which might be extremely advantageous to the enemy. It was quite impossible that either in their Lordships' House, or in the other House of Parliament, they could interfere, without inconvenience, with the details of the business of the Executive Government. If they attempted to do so, the result would be no other than injurious ; and he was persuaded, from his noble and gallant Friend's high professional character, any suggestion which he might transmit to the Board of Admiralty would meet with every attention, and would be far more likely to advance the public interests than if introduced in the shape of discussion or criticism in their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF DERBY did not see that his noble and gallant Friend behind him (the Earl of Hardwicke) was open to the attack made on him by the noble Earl opposite, for they were not now interrupting any plan or project contemplated by the Government, or interfering in any way with its operations. On the contrary, noble Lords on his side of the House had shown by their conduct that they had not the slightest wish to interfere with the measures which the Government had thought necessary to adopt in reference to the present war. But these batteries, which were the subject of observation, were not now projects, being actually carried into operation, and were, therefore, open to the examination and criticism of any one. He was informed that they had cost something like 300,000*l.*, and it was very important that they should have the information which could be brought to bear upon them placed before their Lordships by those possessing the high professional knowledge of his noble and gallant Friend. That noble Earl had inspected them ; and he now pointed out what he considered the various defects in their construction, and the grounds upon which he conceived that they would not answer the expectations of the country. His noble Friend, therefore, had a right to ask the Government whether the designs for these batteries had been submitted to and approved by the scientific portion of the service of the country. If they had been so submitted and approved, then the scientific department of the navy would be mainly responsible for their failure or success ; and his noble Friend was perfectly justified in stating, by way of warning to the Government, the reasons for his apprehension of failure, so that the Government might not go head over heels incurring an enormous expense for the construction of batteries which there was reason to believe were unscientific and inefficient. No subject could be more fit for discussion. It was proposed by the Government to enter into a new and experimental mode of naval warfare, involving an enormous expense, and the means which they adopted, in the opinion of a man of professional knowledge like his noble Friend, were not calculated to answer the purpose for which they were invented. He could not think that the fact of the construction of these vessels becoming known in Russia, in consequence of the observations of his noble Friend, should be a ground for not inquiring into these matters, for there could be no doubt that everything relating to them had been known in Russia from the moment that they had been projected. He must confess that he thought his noble and gallant Friend was only discharging a duty to his country by thus publicly calling attention to what was doubtful as regarded the efficiency of these batteries.

THE BURIAL ACTS.

THE EARL OF SANDWICH presented a petition from inhabitants of Huntingdon, asking for an alteration of the law respecting the burial of the dead (16 & 17 Vict. c. 134). They complained of the operation of certain clauses in the Acts which prevented the opening of vaults, and a correspondence had taken place between them and the Home Office on the subject. The vaults might have been opened without the least prejudice to the health of the inhabitants, and he considered, therefore, that a great injustice and hardship had been inflicted upon the owners. He begged to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to send down inspectors to examine the vaults, and to grant licences for interment in them ?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the notice put by the noble Earl on the notice paper had not given sufficient indication of the nature of the question which he intended to put, and he was afraid there was no Member of the Government present in the House who could give a reply off-hand. He had to request, therefore, that the noble Earl would allow the question to stand over till some subsequent day.

THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER said, he also had to appeal to the Government on behalf of a large proportion of the population of his diocese whose places of burial had been closed, and who really had no places of sepulture for their dead. He would instance the case of Brighton to show the condition to which large places were reduced in consequence of the shutting up of burial-grounds. Here was this large town, with 73,000 inhabitants, which at present, and for some time past, was in a state of the greatest distress for want of places for interment—no person dying within the limits of this vast parish having a right to burial there or elsewhere. The noble Earl had felt it a strong ground of complaint with respect to a limited number of persons in Huntingdon, but the ground was much stronger in respect to Brighton and its 70,000 inhabitants. He (the right rev. Prelate), in conjunction with the petitioners who addressed the House, asked their Lordships not only that there should be an alteration but an amendment of the law, and that the provisions to be framed for that purpose should be sufficient and effectual. Unless the law was made compulsory there would be found the same resistance to it as was found in Brighton and elsewhere.

THE CAVALRY IN THE CRIMEA.

LORD VIVIAN moved for a Return of the Number of Men and Horses sent or to be sent as Reliefs or Reinforcements to the Cavalry now in the Crimea; Regiments, or Squadrons from Regiments, now in this country, to be employed on this service; Date of Embarkation; Name of Transports in which these Reinforcements have been or are to be sent out, stating whether sailing or steam. The noble Lord said, he had, on a former occasion, moved for a similar return; but he had been induced to withdraw it on the assurance given by the Commander in Chief, that he would at once send a number of men from every regiment in this country, so as to form a strong squadron at the seat of war. Believing that to be the best course to be pursued, and believing that the Commander in Chief would act upon the assurance he had given, he did not press for any return. Finding, however, that up to this moment—certainly up to the last very few days—no single regiment of cavalry had been sent to the East, he felt it his duty again to introduce the subject to their Lordships. It appeared to him, if their army were to continue before Sebastopol, it was essential that that branch of it which was of the highest importance in the operations of the siege, and which at the present moment was the most weak, should be reinforced. He knew he should be told that reinforcements had been or were about to be sent to the Crimea. He was happy to know it; and all he now sought was, that they should be sent by the speediest conveyance. What he desired to know was, what were the means which the Government had of conveying these troops? He feared lest the Government should be once again "too late;" and he thought they would best show that there was no ground for apprehension by stating not only the force they were about to send out, but that they were prepared to send them out in steam-vessels.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, it was very true the noble Lord did, on a former occasion, request him to afford the House information as to the way in which he purposed to carry out the reinforcements of cavalry to the army in the East, and that at that time he (Viscount Hardinge) thought the best course would be to send out to each of the ten regiments that were at the Crimea one additional squadron from the nine regiments that were at home. Subsequently, he had seen reason to believe that the better plan would be to take two of the nine regiments and send them en masse, instead of a squadron from each of the nine regiments, as he had proposed in the first instance. Accordingly, two regiments—namely, the 1st Dragoon Guards and the 6th Dragoons—had been sent out. The force of the cavalry in the East at the present moment was 1,300 efficient men. These would be reinforced by about 700 troops, forming the two regiments which were to be sent out. In addition to those two regiments would be the troops that were coming from India. The first regiment had already arrived at the Crimea from India, and, when the whole reached that country, they would amount to rather more than 1,000 rank and file besides officers. There would then be in the Crimea rather more than 3,000 efficient cavalry. He should further add, that the number of recruits that were now ready was at least 1,000, together with 1,500 horses, all between five and six years old. The regiments at home had cheerfully consented to act as instructors to those recruits, by which essential service had been done. The Inspector General and the Duke of Cambridge had concurred in these arrangements. He had nothing to say as to the mode of embarkation, because that did not belong to his department, but more than half of the reinforcements had sailed, and the other half were ready. The noble Lord had asked whether the reinforcements were sent out in sailing or steam vessels?

He was sorry to say there had been but one steamer available, and that the remainder were sailing vessels; but he was satisfied that whatever delay might take place through sending out the reinforcements in sailing vessels, there was at home a very efficient force to send out.

THE EARL OF DERBY hoped there was no indiscretion in giving the Emperor of Russia this information as to the amount of cavalry strength that the Government proposed to send out.

LORD PANMURE said, that when questions of this sort were put relative to the amount of force to be sent out, he always refused to give information; and although, according to the manner in which everything relating to the army was published nowadays, the enemy had every opportunity of knowing exactly the force of which our army consisted, yet it was not a good precedent for Parliament to grant returns which showed the strength of our national forces in time of war. Such returns were usually asked to elicit explanations, such as had been obtained from the Commander in Chief, for a particular and special purpose, and he therefore hoped the noble Lord would not press for the returns. With reference to sending out cavalry reinforcements, every means of despatch had been used to send these and all the other reinforcements at the disposal of the Government. At this moment we and our allies had, he believed, engaged every available steam transport that could be hired for the purpose. But there were not steamers available for the transport for 3,000 miles of so many men as the Government desired to send, and they had, therefore, been compelled to have recourse to sailing vessels, not only for the transport of cavalry and artillery, but also of infantry, to the seat of war.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH hoped that whenever the Government determined to send cavalry to the seat of war they would give the earliest possible information to the Commissary General, because, although it was very easy to find food for men there, it was very difficult to find food for horses. If they had not done so they ought to use the electric telegraph for this purpose, or else these fine horses would find nothing to eat when they arrived, and they would be destroyed before they met the enemy. Noble Lords must recollect that the cavalry and the rest of the army now in the Crimea were living in a desert producing nothing whatever. When cavalry were in the field they could ordinarily obtain the means of subsistence for their horses, but our cavalry in the Crimea must depend for their support upon what was sent out in ships. That made another serious demand upon the tonnage available for transport, to which had been super-added the claims of the Land Transport Corps. He trusted that the instant the Government determined to send out cavalry they would give information to Mr. Commissary General Filder.

LOD PANMURE said, that Mr. Filder had received the information to which the noble Earl had referred; but he had also taken care to have a large quantity of hay sent out from this country and landed in the Crimea for the supply of the troops until the season came round. There could, therefore, be no possibility of a failure in the supply of food for the horses.

LOD VIVIAN would not press his Motion for the production of the returns.

LOD HARDINGE might add, that he had communicated that day with General Scarlett, who had just returned from the Crimea, and that excellent officer had informed him that the force of cavalry in the Crimea when he left was 1,300 men and 400 horses.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

House adjourned to Thursday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWEORN.—For Cork County, Richard Deasy, esq.
PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>o</sup> Carlisle Canonries.

TELEGRAPHIC DESPATCHES FROM THE CRIMEA—QUESTION.

MR. WARNER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, or any one of the Cabinet Ministers, whether the despatch from Lord Raglan, dated the 29th of April, in which he inquires about the Sardinian Contingent, or any other recent despatch from Lord Raglan, has contained information on the state of the army or the progress of the siege; and, if so, what is the nature of that information?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I am sorry to find, Sir, that I was unfortunate in not making myself understood in what I said on a former evening. I distinctly stated, both yesterday and on a former occasion, and in nearly verbatim terms, the contents of the despatches which had been received. I stated yesterday that the Government were ready to communicate to the House any information they received which they considered of interest, and when an hon. Gentleman opposite cheered me—I did not know why—I gave the words of the despatch that had been received. There was in that despatch no information as to the progress of the siege. A despatch has been received to-day, in which it is stated that the Russian force situated between the Belbek and Mackenzie's Farm has been reinforced by two divisions. That is the whole of the information received, and I can only state that which we receive.

MR. WARNER said, he would then urge upon the Government the propriety of pressing Lord Raglan to send that more detailed information which was so much desired in the country.

MR. FRENCH said, he would take that opportunity of asking the First Lord of the Admiralty if the Government had decided whether the electric telegraph to the Crimea would be confined to the Government service, or whether it would be available to the public?

SIR CHARLES WOOD : The telegraph will be retained entirely under the control of the Government. I do not say it will be entirely confined to their use, but it will be entirely under their control.

LOAN BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had to appeal to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire to allow the third reading of the Loan Bill to take precedence of his Motion with respect to Maynooth, on the ground that, as Government were not able to touch the deposit until the Bill had received the Royal Assent, it was desirable to pass the measure as soon as possible, and that a day would be gained by reading it a third time in that House at a sufficiently early hour to allow of its going up to the House of Lords the same evening.

MR. SPOONER said, he was quite willing to accede to the wish of the Government, on the understanding that the third reading should pass sub silentio. He could not consent to forego the right to bring forward his Motion on any other condition, because he did not see any other clear night on which he could bring it forward for weeks to come.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was quite willing to consent to this, but at the same time he might perhaps be permitted to call the attention of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the present unsatisfactory state of the law, which did not allow him to touch the deposit until the Loan Bill had received the Royal Assent, although he was compelled to pay interest on deficiency bills. He wished to know whether his right hon. Friend was willing to consider the propriety of introducing a measure to amend the law on this point.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must admit that the present state of the law was unsatisfactory, and he was willing to take into consideration the propriety of amending it, but he could not positively pledge himself to the introduction of any measure on the subject.

On the Motion, "That the Bill do pass."

MR. FREWEN said, that it had been rumoured that one of the Members for the City of London had contracted with the Government for this loan, and that in consequence there would be a new election for the City. He thought it was desirable that the House should know whether that was the case or not.

Bill passed.

THE CONFERENCES OF VIENNA— QUESTION.

MR. BRIGHT : Sir, I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question upon a matter of very great importance. I was not in the House last night when the noble Lord gave an answer to the question put by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), but on reading what he said in the papers this morning it does not appear to me to have been either distinct or satisfactory. I do not put this question for the purpose of embarrassing the Government in any way. The noble Lord knows that for many weeks past I have been very silent on every matter connected with the war, believing that the noble Lord was desirous to make peace. We have now, however, entered on a new stage, and I am anxious, and so are thousands besides, for some precise information on this most important subject. The fact of the markets rising, corn having gone up from 5s. to 7s. a quarter, is an ominous sign, and proves the extent of the public anxiety. What I want to know is, whether the noble Lord at some early period will tell us distinctly what are the terms which we offered, in conjunction with the French Government, to the Russian Government; what the Russian Government has intimated its willingness to accept; and what other terms of settlement Russia intimated its willingness to propose, or has proposed? We want to know what is the exact distance between the point offered on the one side and the point intimated or offered on the other, in order that the country may know exactly what is the object of the prolonged war in which we are engaged. The noble Lord will admit that I have a right to expect an answer to these questions, unless some extraordinary reason connected with the resumption of negotiations should stand in the way.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: If the hon. Member had been in the House yesterday he would have heard the question he has now put satisfactorily answered. I then stated that it was the intention of the Government to lay on the table of the House, at the earliest opportunity, the whole of the protocols of the Conferences at Vienna; and I added that I thought it would be found that those protocols would contain all the information that the House could expect.

MR. BRIGHT: The noble Lord did not speak of the counter-propositions, or state any time.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The hon. Member will find all the information he requires in the papers. I may say, further, that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has informed me that the papers are being prepared as fast as possible; and I do hope that they will be laid on the table in the course of a few days.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

MR. SPOONER* said, that once more he ventured to bring under the attention of the House the important question to which the notice standing in his name had reference. That question he regarded as a most vital one; and he conscientiously believed that a right settlement of it was necessary for the safety of the Crown, for the integrity of the empire, and for the happiness of his fellow-subjects.

Indeed, it was neither more nor less than this—would they maintain inviolate the Protestant constitution which had been so dearly purchased by their ancestors, and under which the country had so many years been blessed; or would they neglect that important duty, the relinquishment of which would be visited with consequences far beyond his power to describe? If they would maintain that constitution, they must look around them, and see where it was in danger, and he believed its greatest danger was to be found in the practice of yielding, with the view of conciliating, to those who never would be conciliated, unless they attained complete and absolute supremacy.

Since he had had the honour of a seat in that House, he had frequently heard it declared that nothing would satisfy the parties to whom he alluded but placing upon the same footing the Roman Catholic Church and the Established Church of England and Ireland. In bringing the present Motion before the House, he was impelled by a resistless sense of the duty which rested upon him, and he felt that he should be betraying the great trust reposed in him by his neighbours and friends who had returned him to that House, if he witnessed, in silence, the arrogant encroachments which were being made upon the constitution, and listened passively to the unveiled declarations that were put forth, by Roman Catholics themselves, as to their objects.

Various objections had been taken to his Motion; and to those objections he would now endeavour to give as plain an answer as he possibly could. The first to which he would advert was the objection as to time—an objection which, if the question were merely a political one, would be worthy of all consideration; but he dealt with the question as a religious question, and had no hesitation in declaring his conviction that the original establishment and continued endowment of Maynooth was a great national sin, and that if it were persisted in we should have no right to expect anything else than the judgment of Almighty God upon us for abandoning our high duties and sacrificing our great privileges. If, then, it were a sin, the present time was always the time to deal with it, and they were not to permit it to endure a moment longer than they could help; and, viewing it in this light, he felt that no political reasons would be sufficient to justify procrastination in considering this important subject.

The next objection was, that our gallant allies were Roman Catholics, and that we should do nothing that would have the effect of estranging them from us. But he had too much faith in the patriotic principles and generous feelings of our brave and gallant allies to suppose that any jealousy would be excited between the two nations on that score. Moreover, he had heard from a quarter in which he put implicit faith, and to which, if he mentioned it, every Member in the House would pay the most respectful deference, that at this moment there was a strong independent Gallican feeling aroused in France against the ultramontane doctrines which were taught at Maynooth, and which the Pope was endeavouring to enforce in that country. The Archbishop of Paris had at that moment a quarrel with the Pope on the subject of that most monstrous of all impositions—the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. There was as much jealousy in France on the subject of Rome as in England. But he (Mr. Spooner) would not put it on that ground; for he could never believe that our brave and generous allies could be deterred from the object for which they had joined this country by any such consideration.

But he would be told that our own soldiers are Romanists, and he would be asked if he meant to aggravate their feelings. His answer was, no. They were Roman Catholics, it was true, but they were also sound, good, loyal subjects, and if they were once abstracted from the dominion of their priests—once set free from the superstitious influences which beset them—he believed they would rejoice in their liberation as much as the Protestant people of England. They were actuated by true principles, and not even for a moment would he suspect that they could be awayed from their duty by such considerations as these. But there was another view of the case arising out of this. What was meant by not touching Maynooth for the present, while the Roman Catholic soldiers were fighting the battles of their country? Was it meant that it should be touched when that fighting was over? It meant that, or it meant nothing. If, however, that was its meaning, how could such a mode of dealing with these soldiers be tolerated? Was it not to act with the utmost deceit? Surely it would be wrong to conceal your intentions until the fighting was over, and then to carry them out. The House should tell them that, as Protestants, they could not conscientiously consent to support any longer an institution which taught an idolatrous religion.

MR. FAGAN rose to order. Mr. Speaker had, if he was not mistaken, laid it down as a rule that expressions of offensive to the religious feelings of the Members should not be used. The word idolatrous was highly offensive. He (Mr. Fagan) therefore put it to Mr. Speaker whether it ought to be used?

MR. SPEAKER said, it was the practice, on all occasions, that expressions offensive to the religious opinion of any great body of the Members of that House were not desirable, as they were calculated to hurt their feelings.

MR. SPOONER submitted to the decision of Mr. Speaker. He had no wish to irritate any man's feelings; but he might be permitted to say that the word was to be found in the Formula of the Church, as applied to the celebration of the mass, and that the doctrine of masses was stigmatised as one of "blasphemous fables and dangerous deceptions."

The next objection that was made to his Motion was, that it would be a breach of faith to withdraw the grant from Maynooth; that a compact had been made, that an institution had been established, and that the Legislature had no business to touch it. He denied the compact, however, and he maintained that there was nothing to bind the House to continue the grant. It was, in fact, a free grant—a grant given by the liberality of this country, and no sacrifice had been made by the Roman Catholics which would render it of the nature of a compact. What Parliament granted freely, therefore, Parliament was free to resume, as the grant had not been made for any consideration. On this point he (Mr. Spooner) was quite of opinion with one whose memory was still highly respected in that House, and whose words still were received as authority—he meant the late Sir Robert Peel. On the 3rd of April, 1845, what said Sir Robert Peel? He said—

"It is, I trust, conceived in the spirit to which I have referred, a liberal and confiding spirit. We have not introduced it without communication with the leading ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman Catholic Church. It has not been a subject of stipulation or contract with them. We have intimated to them our intention; and we have every reason to believe that they are satisfied with, and grateful for, the measure; that they will strongly recommend its acceptance; and that the great body of the intelligence and respectability of the Roman Catholic community will accept the measure as a liberal and efficient maintenance for the establishment at Maynooth."—[3 Hansard, lxxix. p. 37.]

right hon. Gentleman hoped would follow. He asked any man who had ever held office under Her Majesty since that grant was made—any man who had had anything to do with the elections in Ireland—whether these expectations had been realized? If, then, the object for which the grant was given had failed—if the grant had been received in a spirit different from what had been expected—if the conduct of the recipients had been the reverse of that which it was intended should be promoted—did not the whole ground of that objection to his Motion fall away? But, besides this declaration of Sir Robert Peel, there was a declaration of the noble Lord the Minister for the Colonies, which was equally specific on this point. On the 3rd of April, 1845, the noble Lord said, in the debate on the subject—

"I do not mean to argue, as has been done by other hon. Gentlemen, the question of compact, or whether it would be wise or prudent after fifty years, during which this grant has been made, to stop suddenly, and to declare that you will advance no further sums from the public purse for the purpose of educating the priests of the Roman Catholic religion. But, at the same time, I will say that if you found you were doing that which was mischievous to the community, and that the religious scruples of the community would not allow of the continuance of this grant, or, with reference to civil and political reasons, you found that those you meant to be the teachers of religion had become the leaders and conductors of rebellion—if, I say, you found for any of these causes that there was ground sufficient to refuse this grant—then I can see no valid reason why any compact should restrain you, or why, upon strong grounds of this kind, the House would not be justified in declaring that it would give no further allowance."—[8 Hansard, lxxix, p. 81.]

Leaders of rebellion. Disturbers of the public peace. These were the words of the noble Lord. Were they borne out by the conduct of the parties? If the records of the Irish elections were looked to, it would be seen what steps had been taken to ensure the success of the Roman Catholic candidates. And he (Mr. Spooner) would show that the doctrine taught in Maynooth fully squared with that conduct. He could show that two professors of that College had declared that it might be a mortal sin to vote for the wrong man; and the people of England were paying for the propagation of such pernicious principles. Every one of the cases contemplated by the noble Lord had, consequently, occurred; and he (Mr. Spooner) therefore claimed the support of the noble Lord for his Motion, as well as he did the authority of Sir Robert Peel. The deep-seated feeling of the people of England also called for a repeal of the grant. That was one of the grounds set forth by the noble Lord. He (Mr. Spooner) appealed, however, to hon. Gentlemen whether the communications from their constituents were not a universal and strong expression of their opinions on the subject of Maynooth? Surely, then, he might safely say with the noble Lord that if the religious scruples, as the noble Lord designated them—the religious principles, as he (Mr. Spooner) should designate them, of the constituency were thus outraged, the Legislature was bound to act accordingly.

He (Mr. Spooner) now came to the consideration of the Report of the Commissioners. He would observe that he had performed a task which he believed few other hon. Members had done, having diligently waded through this document, and called in the aid of most valuable assistance to enable him to digest the evidence that had been taken and to get at the real truth of the Report, so that he might place it more clearly and concisely before the House than he otherwise could have done. A careful examination would show that this Report was in great part a complete sham and deceit. When he first made his charges respecting Maynooth no one denied them; and the next year, being convinced of their truth, he declined a proposition of the noble Lord opposite to appoint a Commission, on the ground that the inquiry would be defeated by the Jesuitry of the College. These views were fully borne out by the Report. In the first place there occurred that most unwarrantable proceeding which the noble Lord at the head of the Government admitted to be a fact, namely, that the evidence taken before Her Majesty's Commission was sent by Dr. Cullen to Rome without Her Majesty's consent, and without the knowledge of some of the Commissioners; and that the document remained in Rome for several weeks, if not months. This happened while Parliament and the country were anxiously awaiting the result of the inquiry—whilst the evidence was being "cooked" with the view of making things pleasant. The proceeding was most unconstitutional, involving a breach of the Royal confidence, an insult to the Crown and to that House, and a trifling with the feelings of the people; and in other times impeachment would have followed such a traitorous transaction.

It was clear, on the face of the evidence, that it had been altered without the consent of all the Commissioners. The evidence must have been altered without the consent of the Commissioners. Was the noble Lord at the head of the Government aware that in the return of the bishops educated at Maynooth, made by the officer of the College, and published in the Appendix to the Report, the full territorial titles were given to a Roman Catholic as "Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland," and to Dr. Cullen as "Apostolic Delegate" of the Pope, both of which designations were in open defiance of the Act of Parliament passed by the noble Lord, and of the ancient laws of the realm? The law had thus been trampled upon, apparently with the sanction of the Commissioners, but the sanction was only apparent, because he was authorised by Lord Harrowby, the highly-respected Chairman, to say, that these territorial titles did not appear in the return when given in evidence before them. How they found their way there it was not for him (Mr. Spooner) to say; but it was the duty of the Government to investigate the matter, and to bring the offenders to justice; and if they failed to do so, it was to be hoped that the House itself would insist on a searching inquiry.

The return in question was made by the President of the College, and appeared in page 133 of the Report (Appendix). One of the objectionable titles it contained was this—"Province of Leinster, the Most Rev. Paul Cullen, Apostolic Delegate." Now the law of England recognised no such person as an apostolic delegate, and the law officers of the Crown, if they had done their duty, would not have suffered the individual assuming such a title to remain in the country. Another name given in the same return was this—"His Grace the Most Rev. Joseph Dixon, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland." It was to be regretted that, owing to a defect in the Act, the person who ascribed illegal titles to another was not equally punishable with the individual assuming them; but he confidently asked the Attorney General for Ireland whether, as this return was made by the authorised officer of the College, who was under the control of these Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, who were its principals and trustees, those ecclesiastics were not as responsible for the act of their agent as if they had themselves personally assumed these illegal titles?

The Rev. John O'Hanlon, in his second examination, mentioned, in answer to a question put to him, the name of "Dr. Dixon, Archbishop of Armagh," giving in this instance again the prohibited territorial title. Should any prosecution be instituted under the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, or against any aggression of the Church of Rome upon the Church of England, would not this evidence be quoted as conclusively proving that we had admitted these Roman Catholic Bishops to the full enjoyment of the privileges they had arrogated to themselves? Would it not be said by them that a Royal Commission had given them those titles, that this House had accepted them, and had, by accepting them, given their sanction to such titles? Lord Harrowby had told them that he was perfectly sure these titles could not have been introduced into the evidence with the knowledge of the learned Dr. Twiss, for he said they were both exceedingly particular in guarding against any breach of the law. Well, then, it would rest with the right hon. Speaker and the noble Lord opposite, whether they would sit contentedly by, and suffer this grave breach of the law, giving it their sanction by allowing this illegal document to lie as an uncontradicted report among the records of Parliament. That was the case as regarded these titles.

He would now refer to a very important communication, the original of which was an anonymous one, but the communicator of which, though unknown to him, was well known to highly respectable persons in Dublin. There came into his possession, unsought for by him, some pages of the proof sheets of two of the witnesses' evidence, which had in some way or other got out of the possession of those who had them to correct.

He had therefore seen the alterations which had been made, not the first revision, not the revision of the short-hand writer's notes only, but in a revision of the revise. It was known and admitted that this evidence was in the hands of the persons who gave it for weeks and for months together, and during that time consultations were held, the evidence was reviewed, and the result had been such as he would allude to more particularly by and bye. He would first put it to any man at all accustomed to examine evidence, whether the course taken by the Commission was one calculated to elicit the truth. Their first step was to send out written queries and ask for written answers (relating to the particular doctrines and principles impugned), thus giving the different professors an opportunity of uniting to give such evidence as would suit their opinions ; in other words, laying the foundation for a conspiracy, which conspiracy no man used to evidence, and who had examined these books, could say had not been most ingeniously and completely carried out. Then, again, Lord Harrowby was all along known to have been an advocate and approver of the present College, and no Commissioner was sent there whose opinions were not known to be in favour of Maynooth. Undoubtedly, Lord Harrowby was not a man to allow himself to be influenced by his own opinions in such a case, but he (Mr. Spooner) thought some one ought to have been sent with his Lordship who was opposed to Maynooth. Dr. Twiss, he believed, was similarly inclined with the Earl of Harrowby, though no doubt as worthy of confidence as his Lordship. He did say, however, that, remembering the constitution of the Commission, appointed as it was by a Government known to be favourable to this endowment, there was strong ground for suspicion.

He quoted its Report now, without any confidence in it, though, bad as it was, there was enough in it to show that the teaching of Maynooth was the same as it was when he first brought it before the House ; that certainly there was no amelioration about it, but that, if anything, it was rather worse than before, and that Ultramontane doctrines were on the increase. The truth of the statement above referred to was strongly corroborated by communications made to him by Lord Harrowby before alluded to, namely, that alterations had been made in the evidence, that the full territorial titles had been given without his knowledge.

In the transcript of the short-hand writer's notes the Roman Catholic Bishops were only designated by their legal titles as bishops. The gentleman to whom he had referred said, he could prove on oath, at the bar of that House, that the ordinary permission given to witnesses to correct their evidence was far exceeded, and "that the evidence was so materially altered in many points as to destroy the spirit as well as the letter of both question and answer." He (Mr. Spooner) had seen some original questions and answers referred to, and this was a perfectly accurate description of what had taken place. [The hon. Member here held up the Report, on the first pages of which the evidence was seen as corrected and restored to its original condition at the time it was given, and exhibited a most unprecedented instance of mutilation and alteration, which created much sensation in the House.] His informant said, referring to another part of the evidence which had not come into his (Mr. Spooner's) hands—

"To a question respecting the turbulent conduct of certain students at Maynooth during political excitement, the original reply was this—That such conduct was scarcely to be wondered at when it was discovered that very many of those students were sent from dioceses such as that of Dr. M'Haile, and the students imagined that such ebullitions were tolerable because they were in unison with the avowed principles of their patrons." "This answer appeared in the short-hand writer's notes, but both the question and answer were erased, and marked 'irrelevant.'"

He asked hon. Members, knowing the way in which the Chairman of a Parliamentary Committee would keep the Report in the strict sense and meaning of the evidence, whether it was likely that a chairman would have ordered or sanctioned such alterations ? There was another instance in which nine questions put to the Rev. Mr. Flannagan, the secretary to the trustees, which appeared in the short-hand writer's notes, were compressed into one question and answer in the Report. This was the evidence originally given—nine original questions and answers are compressed into this one—twenty-eight lines into twelve—also, the original oral evidence had eighty questions and answers, while the "doctored" edition had only twenty-two. The following is the true evidence :—

" 65.—There appears upon the minutes, proposals for the purchase of different volumes. At whose instance were those proposals made ?—The proposals are sent in, either through one of the members of the board, or through me, and I lay them before the board.

" 66.—Do they come from the principal, or the council, or from whom ?—From the person who wants to get a book purchased.

" 67.—In the minutes there is this entry made—"Ordered, that fifty copies of the Rev. Dr. Donavan's work should be purchased for the College (at 50s. each, equal to 125l.)" At whose instance would that have been ?—The communication came through me—it was sustained by two or three of the trustees.

" 68.—Who put you in motion ?—The author—if it is to be recommended. I am not prepared to say that those books are bought for premiums ; some of them are given as premiums, some are sold, and some are given out for the use of the College.

" 69.—Some years ago was there not a great loss in the purchase of a large number of breviaries!—I am not aware of that.

"70.—A breviary got up by Coyne, 'Coyne's Diurnal', 1,000 copies, to be purchased at 3*s.*? (15*l.*)—(Answer.) These would of course be required. [Why, and by whom?]

"71.—'200 copies of Dr. Miley's book on the Papal States'—would that be at the solicitation of Dr. Miley himself, or at the instance of the principal?—The communication came from him, not through me, but through some of the bishops.

"72.—'200 copies of Cambrensis Eversus. At whose instance was that? (1*l.* each, equal to 20*l.*)—I think it was the president that brought forward that Cambrensis.

"It should be taken into account that the trustees themselves have been for the most part either Dunboyne students or professors, and therefore they know of their knowledge what would be most useful for the College. There is no compliment for the author ever considered," (this seems a gratuitous remark,) "and there is no specific use mentioned when the books are purchased. It may be said—this will be a very good book for the boys' premiums,' 'this will be a very good book for the library,' or 'this will be a very good book for the students.'

"73.—They are bought at the trade price, are they not?—Yes."

This, which he would now read, was the doctored false edition.—Report, Part II., page 2, No. 21—

"In the minutes furnished by you to the Commissioners there are orders for the purchase of a considerable number of copies of certain books, namely, 50 copies of Dr. Donovan's work; 200 of Dr. Miley's work on the Papal States; 200 copies of Cambrensis Eversus, and 1,000 copies of Coyne's Diurnal, &c. &c." (No mention of breviaries here.) "From whom did these proposals come, and for what purpose were they purchased?—The proposals came either from the authors, the translators, the editors, printers, or proprietors of the books. They were uniformly addressed to the trustees, through the secretary or one of the trustees; and though the orders of the trustees to the bursar were simply 'to purchase so many copies of such a work for the College at the trade price, or at some fixed price,' I can answer that they were purchased for premiums, for sale, or for the use of the students in the library—such purposes being stated at the board when the question of purchasing was discussed."

This evidence was garbled in order to hide a job which was to put money into the pockets of the booksellers. This, in the original evidence, was too open, and therefore the questions and answers were compressed into one. This was, perhaps, not a matter of great importance, but what confidence could they place in evidence which had been so dealt with? The correspondent he had alluded to also wrote that, "with regard to the titles of the bishops, both in the transcript copy and in the second and third revised proofs, they appeared in the simple garb prescribed by law, but that afterwards they were entirely altered," and that, "the minutes would be burthened with the assumed and high-sounding titles peculiar to the Romish bishops." Lord Harrowby had told him that some of the proofs of the evidence were sent for, time after time, and answers were returned that they were sent to this place and then to somewhere else, and that more time was wished for, so that it was delayed so long that they were obliged to leave the final arrangements for the printer with the secretaries.

It would appear that one of the Roman Catholic Commissioners had communicated, through Dr. Cullen, with Rome, and the only inference that he (Mr. Spooner) could draw from this was, that one of the Roman Catholic secretaries had communicated with the corrector of this evidence. He thought that this demanded inquiry, and asked the House whether they would suffer this evidence to remain uninvestigated, and sanctioned by the acceptance and adoption of this House? Would they not adopt an inquiry in order to see whether this was correct or not, and to see who it was that had presumed to send evidence to Dr. Cullen, through whom it was laid before the Pope? He remembered that when he asked the noble Lord at the head of the Government which of the Commissioners had sent the Report to Dr. Cullen, the noble Lord answered, "Of course one of the Roman Catholic Commissioners." It was nothing more than justice to say that this was unknown to Lord Harrowby, Dr. Twiss, or, as he was told, to Baron Pigot. It must therefore be the other Commissioner, Mr. O'Ferrall, who had done this; and the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland was not worthy of his office if he did not institute some legal inquiry into this matter. If an inquiry into the matter were not instituted, the Commission would be deemed a farce and a disgrace.

It had been a work of great labour to arrive at the facts, with so much Jesuitry were they concealed, and he should have been unable to go through with it had he not been assisted by those who were accustomed to deal with such subjects. He had, in 1852, made a statement with regard to the books taught at Maynooth, and he had since renewed that statement, which now remained entirely unanswered and uncontroverted. They had not dared to deny the existence of the books to which he had referred, but they said they used them merely as class books, although the students had free access to them. But they were the books upon which lectures were grounded, and were therefore in fact used for the purposes of teaching. One of the most celebrated of the books (Liguori's Moral Theology), which was highly recommended by the dignitaries of the Church, contained the doctrine that equivocation in a good cause was justifiable. Dr. Wiseman had pronounced the author of this book to be one of the most celebrated—perhaps the most celebrated—of the casuists of the Roman Catholic Church. Another very high authority mentioned in the evidence as a book of first-rate reference upon Canon Law—Reiffenstuel—vouched for by Dr. Murray, a professor at Maynooth, as “the most celebrated of the Canonists,” lays down this doctrine, lib. v. tit. 7, num. 313—

“He who owes anything to a heretic by means of purchase, promise, exchange, pledge, deposit, loan, or any other contract, is, ipso jure, by the law itself, free from the obligation, and is not bound to keep his promise, bargain, or contract, or his plighted faith, even though sworn, to a heretic.”

This was a Maynooth book of reference, and these were its commercial morals! It would require much more evidence than had been adduced, to convince him that those who used the class book in which such an opinion was pronounced had taken any pains to counteract the evil which it was calculated to produce.

He now came to a subject which he always approached with great reluctance—namely, the confessional—and he would take the opportunity of saying that he knew nothing about the disgusting and horrible publication upon that subject which had been sent to every Member of the House. When he received it he applied to the Protestant Association and the Protestant Alliance—the two Societies which took a deep interest in this question—to ascertain whether any of their servants or agents had dared to insult the House by the publication of such a disgusting statement. Neither of those Societies knew anything about the pamphlet, and he had not the shadow of a suspicion as to who was the author, although pains had been taken to discover him. He had, however, with the friends to whom he had alluded, who were competent scholars, compared the details contained in the pamphlet with the books from which they purported to be taken, and he found that they had been accurately quoted. He asked the House whether they were justified in calling upon the people of this country to contribute their money in order to circulate books which contained the disgusting details mentioned in that pamphlet? And this most important moral might be justly founded upon this circumstance—that if the private reading of the filth contained in those books was disgusting, they ought so much the more to revolt at the practice of contributing from the funds of this Protestant nation to teach such pestiferous and polluting matter. One of the highest authorities upon the subject of the confessional was Liguori, who said, vol. i. lib. iv. tr. 4, No. 634—

“This seal” (of confession) “is an obligation of Divine Law, most strict in every case, even where the safety of a whole kingdom should be imperilled, to conceal, even after the death of the penitent, all those things that have been spoken in confession” (that is, in order to sacramental absolution), “a disclosure of which would render the sacrament irksome or odious.”

This was a book which, above all others, was relied upon by the best authorities of the Roman Church, and given to the study of young men; but was it a book that ought to receive the sanction and approval of the Legislature of this country? He felt assured that the whole nation did join in thanksgiving at the providential escape of our august Ally the Emperor of the French from the recent attempt that had been made upon his life; but suppose that the intended assassin had confessed to the priest that he purposed committing the crime he had attempted to perpetrate, the confessor, on the authority of this highly recommended book, dared not have divulged the premeditated crime, because the seal of the confessional was held to be inviolable. In another part of the work, the reason given why the priest must not disclose a fact made known to him in the confessional, was, “because he knows it, not as a man, but as God.”—Ib. No. 646. In fact, it was held that the priest stood in the confessional in the place and character of God—oh! the blasphemy of such a statement!—to bear the confessions and outpourings of the heart of the sinner.

Regarding elections: in reading the evidence given before the Commissioners, it would be found that almost every professor began by stating that the Pope had no power to interfere with anything temporal, and that, generally speaking, the elections were temporal matters; but, in a most Jesuitical manner, the question was then met by stating that there might be occasions when it would become a mortal sin to vote for a wrong candidate; that it was the duty of the elector to consult the benefit of the Church; that, in certain cases, their temporality became swallowed up in their spirituality, and that in such cases the priests were not only authorised, but obligated, to influence the elector in giving his vote.

Dr. O'Hanlon, in his evidence before the Commissioners, No. 148, admitted that the distinction between temporal and spiritual affairs was sometimes "a very nice one, and was no doubt a troublesome question," and that there were some matters which were not necessarily either of a purely spiritual or a purely temporal nature. The same witness acknowledged that every vote for a Member of Parliament was a temporal matter, its immediate end or object being to invest a man with a trust or privilege to be exercised to some extent or other for the worldly benefit of the people; but he then proceeded to state that a vote might also become a spiritual matter, because its direct and immediate effect might sometimes be the commission or avoidance of sin. Further on, in his evidence, Dr. O'Hanlon stated that the priest was not competent to inflict any censure of the Church, yet "absolutely speaking, he would be warranted in withholding any sacraments of the Church from a man by reason of his preferring one candidate to another, because a priest is not only warranted, but bound, to withhold the sacraments from a man who is disposed to commit a mortal sin." In the case of simple and ignorant people, who, the witness said, were a very numerous class in Ireland, it was said to be necessary that some intelligent person should prescribe the course they ought to pursue, because they were utterly incompetent of themselves to form any rational or decided judgment on the matter; and that the most likely man was the priest. Thus, it would be seen that the latter part of the evidence of Dr. O'Hanlon entirely contradicted the former part, wherein he stated that the Pope had no right whatever to interfere in elections. If the charges which had been made in newspapers and other publications in this country against Roman Catholic priests had been falsely preferred against any clergyman in this country, he ventured to say that on the first day of term an application would have been made by the person accused for a criminal information against his slanderers. Could it be supposed for a moment that any well-educated, honest priests, against whom such charges were made falsely, would submit to them if they were innocent?

With regard to the subject of oaths and equivocation, he found in Liguori (lib. iii. tr. 2, No. 154,) the following passage—

"These things being established, it is a certain and common opinion among all divines, that for a just cause it is lawful to use equivocation in the propounded modes, and to confirm it with an oath."

Liguori's definition of a just cause was—"But a just cause is any honest end, in order to preserve good things for the spirit, or useful things for the body." How was it possible to live in society with any security upon such terms as these?

He would now ask the attention of the House to the subject of the rejection by the Roman Catholic authorities of the works of Bailly. The Commissioners reported—"The works of Bailly having been placed in the Index of prohibited books at Rome, the trustees of Maynooth at their next meeting directed them to be discontinued in the College." The Rev. J. O'Hanlon, who was examined before the Commission, in reply to the question whether he knew why Bailly had been condemned, and why his works were placed in the Index, said—

"I have no official or positive knowledge why he was condemned; but, if it be necessary to give an opinion on the subject, I should say that he was condemned because he was a decided Gallican. (Appendix No. 1.) It is perfectly certain that the Gallican doctrines, at least to their full extent, are not acceptable to the Pope. Besides, Bailly has advanced a doctrine on the subject of marriage, which is also distasteful in Rome."

"Bailly maintains the separability of the contract of marriage from the sacrament, contending that marriage among Christians may exist as a valid contract without being a sacrament. The present Pontiff, in his Allocution to the Cardinals, September, 1852, in reference, I think, to some disputes which were at the time disturbing some of the South American Churches (with the Archbishop of Lima), has formally laid down that no marriage among Christians can be valid unless it be a sacrament. Bailly and the French theologians generally maintain a different opinion; and this may be one of the reasons, if not the principal one, why Bailly was disapproved of by the Pope, and placed in the Index."—Report, pt. 2, p. 5, No. 8.

The fact was that Bailly opposed the doctrines of the Ultramontane party with respect to marriage, and maintained that marriage among Christians might exist as a valid contract, without being a sacrament.

Dr. O'Hanlon was asked whether it would be considered as a matter of course that any book put in the Index was not to be used in any Roman Catholic College, and he stated that the Index was not received, and therefore imposed no obligation in Ireland, adding, "but, as clergymen belonging to an ecclesiastical institution, we feel ourselves constrained to defer to the express wishes of the Pope," and that it would be "unbecoming to continue a book which the Pope had disapproved." And again—"The placing such a book as Bailly in the Index in the time of Louis XIV. I am sure would not have displaced it in the French Universities." [Who, it seems, were before the British as to constitutional independence.] What, then, became of the declarations that Papal Rescripts, Allocutions, and Bulls were not legally binding? What became of the declaration that the Pope exercised no influence over Maynooth College? He would ask that House, were they disposed to truckle to the Pope? What did it all amount to, but that this country was absolutely contributing its money to support the teaching of doctrines under the guidance and direction of the Pope, who, it was clear, had the control of all the books used in the College of Maynooth for the purposes of education, and whose authority every priest was bound in conscience to obey? One of the professors, Dr. Crolly (p. 29, part ii.), had stated this matter clearly enough, thus—

"I repeat, if the Pope issue any commands on the subject of education, it is the duty of the subject to obey. If the Pope had not control of education he might as well give up ruling the Church altogether."

He could produce many other extracts with regard to these books, but he hoped he had said enough to induce hon. Members to read them. He was afraid Ministers had no time to make themselves thoroughly acquainted with them. The book of Bailly had been rejected because it maintained that a marriage was valid without being a sacrament. The Ultramontane doctrine, the opposite of that, was, that every marriage, to be valid, must be a sacrament. Let them suppose the consequences of applying such a doctrine to civil succession and other matters connected with marriage in this country. Let them recollect the large body of priests who had been educated, under the influence of the Pope, at Maynooth, and the results that would follow if they were unhappily to succeed in embuing the population of this country with the Ultramontane doctrine in question. What had happened once might happen again. Questions of succession might arise with regard to the Crown; and as the doctrine of the Church of Rome was, that every marriage, to be valid, must be a sacrament, an inference might be drawn that there was no legitimate marriage of the Sovereign, and therefore, no legitimate succession. He called upon them to stop the support given to a clergy who bowed to the Pope's decrees, and who were found by the evidence—garbled and cooked as it was—to acknowledge the express wish of the Pope as a command with regard to the education in the College of Maynooth. It was by their means, under their patronage, that such anti-national views and wishes were carried out.

He asked them to put an end to such a system. He asked to be allowed to bring in a Bill to withdraw the national consent and support from a College positively and directly under the influence of the Pope, and which thinks itself bound to obey his wish so far as to afford only that education which he in his wisdom might think fit. The Bill which he proposed to bring in had been most carefully considered. It would provide that out of the present grant the students at the College at the time of the passing of the Bill should continue to receive their allowance up to the conclusion of the period of their residence—that was to say, till eight years from the dates at which they had respectively entered the College. It was also but just that the professors employed in teaching the students should have their allowances continued to them during that period. He thought it was only fair—however opposed the whole system might be to their consciences—that they should not leave those young students who had entered Maynooth, to become the victims of the national sin which this country had been guilty of in endowing the College. That burthen, that moral wickedness, they must take on themselves. With the exception mentioned, he should propose to abolish all support to Maynooth, so that it might no longer be an incorporated body, or have the national sanction of a corporation. He proposed that the members of the present corporation should be constituted trustees, and that they should have full power as trustees to deal with all their property in the same way that they might have done before the Act of 1845. The passing of the Bill would be a national abjuration of the principle upon which Maynooth had been founded—a declaration that they were wrong, and that they had committed a great national sin, while, at the same time, it would provide for the completion of the education of those young men who had entered the College trusting to the promises of the Legislature.

They had called upon the Sovereign to take an oath to maintain the constitution of Church and State as by law established. They had taken a solemn oath of allegiance to the Sovereign, the meaning of which was, that they were bound to uphold the Sovereign in maintaining the constitution as established by law. In making an appeal to the Dissenters, he could assure them that, if anything more was wanting to perfect religious toleration, no one would more willingly consent to it than he would. He asked them to consider their own fate if Papal Rome should obtain its supremacy. They would do well to recollect the old fable of the lion and the ass, and not to flatter themselves that they would enjoy in that event even the ass's privilege, which was to be devoured last. If they destroyed the Church of England they would destroy the very bulwark of their own toleration, and would speedily become the victims themselves. Among Roman Catholics there were, he believed, many sincere Christians, who, through the forms and ceremonies of that Church, really worshipped the Saviour, notwithstanding the erroneous character of the forms themselves, and in appealing to them he did so with confidence, though deplored their mistaken opinions in religious matters. It was his lot to reside in Worcestershire, in the immediate neighbourhood of some Roman Catholic families of the highest respectability. He believed that most of them had never investigated the pernicious doctrines which were taught in the books in question at Maynooth. He knew that they were good neighbours, impartial magistrates, liberal dispensers of charity, and he acquitted them altogether of the least intention of being in any way guided by doctrines such as those to which he had referred, and which, notwithstanding the cheer of the hon. Member well versed in all the trickery of the system, he repeated, were taught at Maynooth.

He begged the House to consider the working of Sir Robert Peel's Act. Had

it conciliated Ireland? Were they not on their knees to the priest? Had they not heard the very name of toleration denounced as an insult? Had not every concession been followed by fresh demands? In spite of the oath not to disturb the existing state of property of the Established Church, Roman Catholics in that House and on the hustings, in terms not to be mistaken, had declared that they would not rest satisfied till they enjoyed equality with the Established Church in Ireland. [Cries of "Name!"] He had repeatedly heard such a declaration from the benches on the other side; and when last he alluded to it he was met by assenting cheers from two or three Members on the other side. They cheered his assertion that they had declared that they never would be content till they were on an equality with the Protestant Establishment. Would not that be a disturbance of those relations of the Church which, by their oath, they were bound to respect? The lesson to be learnt from the past was, that the more they conceded to Roman Catholics the more they required; the more you gave them the more haughty were their demands; and that they would never cease their efforts, till this country should cease to be that which was its glory and pride—a Protestant country with a Protestant Sovereign, with a Protestant Church established by law, and with Protestant Dissenters freely tolerated and in the full enjoyment of all civil rights and privileges. He hoped he had said nothing to hurt the feelings of any one. His only aim in what he had said with respect to those who differed from him in their religious creed was, that he might be the happy instrument of opening their eyes by leading them to see the errors and delusions under which they had so long laboured.

In conclusion, he would say that he could hardly expect many more opportunities of addressing the House on this subject. He had come to that age when he was no longer actuated by ambition—at least, by any other ambition than that of conscientiously discharging his duty to God and to his country; and it was his earnest prayer, as an old man, contemplating, perhaps more closely and more intensely than he ever had done, the realities of eternity, that the House and the country might, in time, see the full extent of the responsibility which pressed upon them in relation to this question. He looked upon the support of the Roman Catholic religion as a national sin. Let Bible readers examine the Holy Word of God, and see how that religion was denounced as a high crime against Almighty God, and how the finger of Providence was pointed against it. He trembled when he looked at the precipice on which his country stood, and it would be to him a source of inward comfort and satisfaction in the nearer view of that change which awaited him if he could see the prospect of an arrest being put on the progress of Popery, and a way opened for the advancement of true religion. He could not apologise for having so long detained the House, for he felt he had only performed a most bounden duty in so doing, but he did most sincerely thank the House for its very kind attention to his observations.

MR. DUNLOP rose to second the Motion. He did so, he said, without the slightest hesitation, but not without some regret as to the position of antagonism to his Irish friends in which his sense of duty placed him. He could say for himself, and those who thought with him, that they found themselves opposed to these friends with regret; but they were actuated by no desire to deny them their just rights and legitimate influence. If they looked back to the time when the struggle for emancipation commenced, it would be found that, while in no part of the United Kingdom was the Roman Catholic religion more strongly opposed than in Scotland, nowhere was a more hearty and generous support given to the just claims of the Roman Catholics; and he believed that in Scotland still, if any attempt were made to deprive them of their civil privileges, the people would stand forward, as before, and maintain their right to the most perfect equality in every respect with their Protestant fellow-citizens. Speaking for those who agreed with him in these matters, he would say that they sought to deprive the Roman Catholics of nothing which they asked for themselves. They desired no endowment for their non-established communions. In Ireland they desired to maintain no body superior to another in reference to endowments; and last year they felt compelled, by a sense of justice, to vote against the continuance of the Regium Donum in Ireland, affecting deeply though it did their Presbyterian brethren in that country. Their friends on the other side, with whom they co-operated on this question, knew that they had no desire to maintain the Established Church of Ireland, and that they looked upon the abolition of the endowment of Maynooth as a step towards the overthrow of that establishment. The operation of the system under which Maynooth was endowed acted injuriously upon our rulers themselves. They had never yet seen a Ministry who had resolved to maintain their power solely by doing that which they believed to be just and right, and most conducive to the interests of the people at large. Formerly Governments courted the great borough proprietors. Since the passing of the Reform Bill they had applied themselves to obtain the support of some one class or another in the State, and, in following out that principle, they desired, above all things, to have religious bodies subject to their influence, which must be alike injurious to the governors and the governed. The endowment of Maynooth was in itself indefensible upon any ground; but as his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) had considered the question principally in a religious point of view, he should, in the observations he had to make, address himself to its social and political bearing. There were various reasons why he objected to this grant. In the first place, its continuance maintained a constant danger of the endowment of the Romish clergy, and consequently of all denominations, without regard to truth or error, a system which would thus be fatal to the freedom which he thought ought to be maintained in religious matters generally. Then, setting aside for a moment the main proposition that this endowment was indefensible, as being paid for the purpose of preparing men to teach that which was contrary to the truth, he maintained that, in a social and political light, it exercised a very injurious influence. It had been the great desire of the educational reformers of this country to bring the people to adopt one system of united instruction. The efforts which had been made in that direction in Ireland, however, had been strenuously resisted by the clergymen of the Roman Catholic Church, and that they were likely to continue in the same course of obstruction was manifestly proved by the evidence which had been laid before the Commission. Professor O'Hanlon, in his evidence, had stated that when the Pope issued his commands with reference to disowning a particular plan of education, he had a perfect right to obedience, inasmuch as such obedience was no sin; and "that if the Pope had not the power of controlling education he might as well give up ruling the Church altogether." Now, he (Mr. Dunlop) should ask, what must the fate of education in Ireland be when committed to the direct influence of the author of the "Index"? But let the House look at the question in a political point of view. Maynooth was a seminary for the training up of priests, whose duty, as it appeared from the evidence taken before the Commission, it was not only to advise a member of the laity with respect to the vote which he should give at an election, but to deter him from the sacraments if such advice were neglected. It had been asked by the Commissioners whether a priest might impose upon any individual the obligation of voting contrary to his own judgment, and the answer had been that if the judgment of the individual were a rational one he could not, otherwise the priest might insist upon his acting in opposition to that judgment. It had also been stated that in the case of simple and ignorant people—a very numerous class in Ireland—it was in the opinion of the professor who had given the testimony, not only the privilege but the bounden duty of the Roman Catholic priest to prescribe to him the course which he ought to pursue with respect to voting for any particular candidate at an election, and that it was the duty of such individual to follow that advice. In the evidence of Dr. Moriarty, in answer to the question—

"Are there no circumstances under which the Pope could release a citizen from his oath of allegiance?"

The reply was—

"Most emphatically I say, none. But as our greatest constitutional lawyers, and, as I think, our best theologians, hold that there are cases when the allegiance of the subject ceases, and when the Government of a country may be justly overthrown, I consider that the Pope is the fittest authority to decide in many cases whether such circumstances have arisen; in many cases he could not decide, and I firmly believe that in such cases he would not undertake to do so. In no case can he cause the allegiance of a subject to cease; his power in such a matter being simply declaratory, not enabling."

The Pope could not make the allegiance to cease, but he could declare when circumstances existed which in themselves brought the allegiance to an end. All depended upon the value of the declaratory judgment of the Pope, and with reference to that question the answer was—

"Were we to consult the Holy See upon our allegiance or obedience to our temporal Sovereign, and that an answer were given us, it ought to satisfy the consciences of Catholics, considering the maturity with which the Holy See proceeds, and considering also that we know it to be an authority divinely appointed and divinely assisted for our guidance in the way of salvation, and, consequently, in the path of duty. But as the Pope's infallibility does not extend to particular cases, and as the decision might rest on allegations the truth of which some might doubt, I can conceive that, in certain circumstances, some might not be entirely satisfied, even though retaining all due reverence for the Holy See."

And, again, he said it was a mistake to suppose that obedience to the Pope was limited to this matter, for Dr. Moriarty was asked the following question—

"At the same time, if a man were disposed to transfer his allegiance, or to give it up, that decision of the Pope would enable him to give it up with a safe conscience, would it not?"

And the reply was—

"Yes; for a Catholic should feel his conscience at rest when acting in accordance with a decision of the Pope."

Now, they had among the Roman Catholics a body of men who formed a certain political party in this country, and was it, he would ask, reasonable that the State should be asked to establish for any particular party—suppose for the Jacobites of other times—a college by which they might the more efficiently carry into effect the political views which they happened to entertain? Such a proposition would be absurd in the case of any political party, and it was still more so when applied to the Roman Catholic priests, who were the subjects of a foreign potentate—the head of a great political organisation. The connection between the Government and the Roman Catholic hierarchy constituted a union painful to every person who had the interest of his country sincerely at heart. They had become acquainted with instances in which the pope had been consulted with reference to measures of internal government to be adopted in this Kingdom; and he could not help feeling, that whether in the case of a Pope, an Emperor, or a King, it was a fact dishonourable and dishonouring to those concerned in it, injurious to the dignity of the Crown, and detrimental to the best interests of the nation, that any Foreign Potentate should be permitted to have a voice, even in the slightest degree, in the management of the internal affairs of this country. The whole system, in fact, was utterly at variance with the spirit of liberty which prevailed in Britain, and tended to destroy that right of private judgment which was essential to nerve the human mind in maintaining its independence. There were two Amendments about to be proposed to the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire; one by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Scholefield) and the other by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart). Both of those Amendments had for their objects to draw the House away from the consideration of the question of the endowment of Maynooth. The hon. Member for Birmingham proposed that all church endowments in Ireland should be abolished, and, for his own part, he (Mr. Dunlop) was perfectly willing that all sects should be left free without any endowment; but at the same time, in carrying out those views, he did not deem it necessary to combine the elements of opposition against him. He believed, also, that many who supported that Amendment two years ago were now willing to take those endowments one by one, and to deal with them in detail. He had considerable satisfaction in thinking that the grounds of opposition to the particular endowment under their consideration had become more enlarged than had some time since been the case, and that they were not based upon the desire to act oppressively with reference to any religious body in particular. We had arrived at a period when we no longer sought to throw any obstacles in the way of the enjoyment of the political or religious liberty of Roman Catholics; but at the same time we should be prepared to insist that a system, such as that which prevailed in Maynooth, should not be fostered by the State.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That this House do resolve itself into a Committee for the purpose of considering the Acts for the Endowment of the College of Maynooth, with a view to the withdrawal of any endowment out of the Consolidated Fund, due regard being had to vested rights or interests."

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he had given notice of an Amendment to the following effect—"That the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the existing state of Ecclesiastical endowments in Ireland." The objections of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr.

Spooner) to the endowment of Maynooth were based upon three grounds; namely, that it was anomalous that a Protestant State should endow a Roman Catholic College; that the theological opinions of the Roman Catholic clergy deserved condemnation; and that they themselves interfered unjustifiably in politics. With respect to the first objection, he was to a certain extent inclined to concur in the opinion that there was an anomaly in a Protestant State endowing a Roman Catholic college, but did not the endowment of Maynooth bear testimony to the still greater anomaly of the whole ecclesiastical system of Ireland? Had not that endowment been a sort of set-off against the still greater anomaly of maintaining a Protestant establishment in a country where five-sixths of the population were members of the Roman Catholic persuasion. In 1795, the success of the French arms, and the unsettled state of Ireland, had alarmed the English Government, and then it was that upon Maynooth an endowment had first been bestowed. In 1845, the augmentation of that endowment had been the result of the convulsion occasioned in Ireland by the monster meetings, and of a dispute with America in relation to the Oregon boundary, which at the time had assumed a somewhat serious character. If the Government of the present day were to follow out the policy of Pitt and Peel, the grant of Maynooth ought to be still further increased; because the position of the affairs of this country was now such as ought to make Her Majesty's Ministers not a little uneasy. The worst enemies of England, even the Czar himself, could desire nothing more anxiously than that some measure should be adopted which would irritate the public mind in Ireland and convulse once more that country, rendering again necessary the presence there of 30,000 troops, and causing the fidelity of the army abroad to be suspected.

"Hoc Ithacus velit, et magno mercentur Atride."

By no means, certainly, could such a proceeding be more speedily realised than by the success of the measure which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had announced it to be his intention to propose. No more effectual course than that could be adopted to convulse Ireland with monster meetings from one end of it to the other; to sow the seeds of disaffection in the minds of the Irish people, and to prevent them from enlisting in our army. He therefore should entreat the House to beware how, in a moment of danger such as the present, they gave their sanction to the principle which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire asked them to adopt. With reference to the political influence which the Roman Catholic clergymen in Ireland were said to exercise, he should observe that they, for the most part, belonged to the class of small farmers, that they passed their youth among the people, that their sympathies were with the people, and that it was, under such circumstances, but natural that they should upon almost every occasion be consulted by the members of their flock—the more so, because he was most likely the only educated person with whom they happened to come in frequent contact. Previously to 1826, when Catholic Emancipation became the question of the hustings, the advice of the Roman Catholic clergy was confined entirely to private concerns, and they never interfered to direct the political suffrages of the people; but when it became the great question, whether a person professing the faith of the great majority of the people should or should not be qualified to make laws, many tenants, who had before given their votes cheerfully in accordance with the wishes of their landlords, were brought to the poll to record their votes, at the risk of being turned out of their holdings if they refused, against the man who thought that the religious faith which they entertained ought not to disqualify a person from being eligible to make laws. It was not surprising, therefore, that the Roman Catholic clergy should then advise the people how to exercise their suffrage, and should tell them to make it a point of national or religious honour to vote for the candidate who did not think that their religious faith should form a political disqualification. Such was the first occasion of the political interference of the priests in Ireland, and such the cause which forced the ministers of religion to become the tribunes of the people. Many reasons had since induced the Roman Catholic clergy to continue to exercise the same influence, and at the last election they were of opinion that a very unnatural and a very unchristian spirit of bigotry had been attempted to be raised against their religion throughout the United Kingdom. He knew that many persons objected not so much to the political interference of the priests as to the language they had been reported to use. Far be it from him to justify some of that language; but it was not fair to ascribe to the whole body language only used by a portion, and it should be borne in mind that exaggerated expressions were very common on the other side of the Channel among all parties. But had the Roman Catholic clergy confined themselves to directing the people how to dispose of their suffrage? Had they not at different times done their best to suppress attempts at revolution, and was it not almost entirely owing to the exertions of the Roman Catholic clergy that the attempted rebellion in 1848, which might have proved a very serious embarrassment to the Government, was prevented? The charge against the Roman Catholic clergy was, that they had taught the people how to gain their liberties by constitutional means, but they had at the same time prevented them from using violence. But were the Roman Catholic clergy, and especially those connected with Maynooth, the only clergy who interfered with politics? Montesquieu stated, that to the interference of the clergy in Spain, it was to be attributed that that country had not become one of the worst of despotisms. But was the hon. Member for North Warwickshire quite sure that the Roman Catholic priests were the only clergymen who interfered in politics? If such was the case he was entirely mistaken, and was attributing to the Roman Catholic clergy a line of conduct in pursuing which they were, as compared with the ministers of other religions, by no means singular. Was it not notorious that the Scottish clergy had in past ages taken a leading part in the struggles of their nation for civil and religious liberty? Was it not equally well known that the Dutch Protestant clergy had largely contributed to raise the House of Orange to sovereign power in their country? And were hon. Gentlemen opposite quite sure that the Protestant clergy of these kingdoms did not at the present day interfere in politics? Was it not generally supposed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) had at the last general election failed to secure his return for Liverpool, in consequence of the opposition of the Protestant clergy? He (Mr. P. Urquhart) could state, that at his own last election the parson of his parish had canvassed against him. So much for the political part taken by Roman Catholic clergymen—so much for making that an argument against continuing the grant to Maynooth—a grant which he would be prepared to consider the propriety of withdrawing, if the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire would consent to open the whole question of Ecclesiastical endowments in Ireland. But until the hon. Gentleman and his supporters should show their readiness to adopt that course, he should feel it his duty to offer his strenuous opposition to that Motion. After the observations that had been made, he should not press his Amendment.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he could not help regarding the present Motion as a fresh product of that sleepless bigotry which found in his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) an ever ready and willing instrument—a bigotry which, he believed, would never be satisfied until it should have brought every faith and persuasion within the narrow limits of its own wretched sectarianism. He thought he might take it for granted that the main charges against the College of Maynooth were that it taught religious error—that its doctrines were inconsistent with loyalty to the State—and that some of its teachings were essentially and grossly immoral. Into the question of religious truth or error the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the College of Maynooth could not enter. It was not their province to say what was or what was not religious truth. But the Commissioners had reported on the question of loyalty inculcated at that College, and also on the question of the morality of the students. He would, before resuming his seat, read two extracts from the Report bearing upon those points. He should, however, first remark that his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire had not read a single passage from the Report; but had made all his quotations from the evidence given before the Commissioners. Now it should be observed that the Report was not founded on any special portion of the evidence, but on the evidence generally, while any particular part of the evidence could only convey the opinion of some one individual; and, under these circumstances, he did not think it altogether fair that his hon. Friend should have made no reference whatever to the Report. Upon the subject of the loyalty inculcated in that college, the Commissioners stated that—

"We should be doing injustice to the college if we failed to report, as the general result of the whole evidence before us, that we see no reason to believe that there has been any disloyalty in the teaching of the college, or any disposition to interfere with the obligations of an unreserved allegiance to Her Majesty."

Then, with respect to the morality of the students, they stated—

"We have heard no imputation from any quarter against the moral character of the young men, and we have no reason to believe that their general conduct is other than irreproachable."

And, again, when treating of the preparatory instruction for the confessional, they declare—

"We are here bound to say that we have no reason to believe from the evidence of any party that these studies have had a practically injurious effect on the mind and character of the students."

This was the general result of the Report, and it was in that way he wished to view it, and not in the partial and contracted spirit in which it had been taken by a body of Gentlemen with whom the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was associated—namely, the Protestant Alliance. That body had put forth a publication called Ten Facts from the Maynooth Report, which had, he believed, been circulated among the Members of the House generally. The title in question would naturally imply that the facts had been taken from the Report itself, and not from the evidence. But the very first of those facts, which was headed "The poverty urged for the endowment is unsustained," was stated not on the authority of the Report, but on the authority of the Rev. Denis Brasby, one of the witnesses. And who was the Rev. Mr. Brasby? Why it appeared that he was a gentleman who had at one time brought an action against the president of Maynooth for a gross and malicious libel. He (Mr. Scholefield) did not mean to undertake the defence of the president of Maynooth in that case; he had nothing to do with that matter; but he said that the evidence of a gentleman in the position of the Rev. Mr. Brasby was not that on which any charge against the college could be made fairly to rest. It was stated, in the next place, in the publication to which he was referring, that "the oath of allegiance was evaded." That fact was alleged to be taken from the Report; but there was not a word to that effect in the Report signed by the Commissioners. The evidence adduced in favour of the allegation was that of the Rev. Mr. Brasby, and that of the Rev. John Burke, a convert to Protestantism. Now he did not say that a convert to Protestantism might not tell the truth just as well as any other man ; but he said that that was not the evidence from which any one anxious to state the facts of the case fairly would make his selections. The authors of that publication further stated, that "the money is paid, but loyalty is not taught," and they added that "the Commissioners only stated that they had no reason to believe that there was any disloyalty taught." But the Commissioners had gone further, for they had stated that—"They should be doing injustice to the college if they failed to report as the general result of the whole evidence before them that they saw no reason to believe that there had been any disloyalty in the teaching of the college."

His hon. Friend (Mr. Spooner) had talked of the Jesuitry professed at Maynooth, but he (Mr. Scholefield) could not help observing that he had never seen a more remarkable instance of Jesuitry than that displayed by the gentleman who had drawn up that pamphlet. What were the reasons why that endowment should be withdrawn? His hon. Friend had given them to understand that it was not so much Maynooth as the Roman Catholic religion to which he objected. But it would be a perfect absurdity to suppose that Parliament would withdraw the grant to Maynooth because the Roman Catholic religion was taught there. If his hon. Friend wished to succeed in his object, he should show that the profession of the Roman Catholic religion rendered men unfit for the proper discharge of the duties of life. But where was the proof that the profession of the Roman Catholic religion made men less loyal, less chaste, less honourable, less good, than his hon. Friend or the followers of any other creed? He wanted to know if the thousands of Roman Catholic soldiers at present serving in the East were less brave, less faithful to their Queen, and less devoted to their duty than the best Episcopalian Englishman or members of the Church of Scotland? His hon. Friend dared not say that they were. But his hon. Friend had told them that he had the support upon that occasion of gentle-men who were par excellence the friends of religious liberty, which liberty they considered was at present in danger. It was certainly an extraordinary circumstance that religious liberty should be in danger, and that its defender should be his hon. Friend, who was the sworn enemy of every measure for the relaxation of the laws imposing disability on the Jews or Dissenters. It appeared that there was a society in London called "The Liberation of Religion Society," which also supported his hon. Friend. He confessed he could not understand why it did so; but if the members of that society were only as true to his hon. Friend as they were to the cause of religious liberty, to which they professed a special allegiance, he did not think his hon. Friend would have much reason to congratulate himself on their support. Where was the smallest evidence that the presence of Roman Catholics among us in any way jeopardised our civil liberties? If he could see any indication of an attempt on the part of the Roman Catholics to destroy our civil rights, he should be prepared to pass the most stringent measures to restrict such an attempt. He was assured, however, that his hon. Friend was not contending for religious rights or liberties, but for what might be considered religious truth. But that surely was not the place to consider what was religious truth. What was religious truth to one man was religious error to another; and by what authority could his hon. Friend undertake to decide for other men what was religious truth? He knew of no such authority for any men in the world; and least of all did he know of any such authority for men—he was not then speaking of his hon. Friend, but of other parties—who seemed to know all Scripture by heart, and to have every one of its texts present to their minds, except that one which declared that "Charity is above all." He believed that the Church of England had many grave errors to answer for. But, at all events, its high educational training had contributed hitherto to keep it comparatively free from a spirit of narrow and illiberal persecution. He was sorry, however, to have to say, that he saw many symptoms at present that the Church was imbibing that spirit. He found among its members men of highly respectable positions, who, not content with resisting the claims of Dissenters, or with refusing to emancipate the Jews, or with traducing the Roman Catholics, were directing the most bitter complaints against some of the most pious and the most emi-gent members of their own Church. He had that day had a pamphlet sent to him, from which he learnt that a rev. gentleman of the name of Hobart Seymour, had been addressing the members of the Protestant Alliance in Bath, and while speaking of the Roman Catholic colleges in Ireland, he suggested that if they wanted tutors some of the tractarian party in this country could very well be spared them—

"If they want a parish priest," said the rev. gentleman, "we can let them have Mr. Bennett, of Frome; if an archdeacon, we can give them Archdeacon Denison; if nothing less than a D.D. will content them, we can throw in Dr. Pusey, and if they go so high as a bishop, we can let them have Samuel of Oxford and Henry of Exeter."

But if he (Mr. Scholefield) were called upon to state whom the Church could best spare, he would choose such gentlemen as Mr. Seymour himself and his followers; and he would even—to use Mr. Seymour's words—"throw in" his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire, rather than lose any one of even the least discreet of the eminent men who had been so slightly referred to. But let the Dissenters beware how they joined that section of the Church of England. They might rely upon it that that section was not more true to its instincts of opposition to the Roman Catholic faith than to its instincts of opposition to the rights of conscience everywhere. The grant to Maynooth was an anomaly, and he was as much in favour of removing it as his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire himself. But that was only a part of a most anomalous system; and if the grant were to be withdrawn he could see but one fair and honourable mode of accomplishing that object—namely, to sweep away every analogous endowment in the country. He was afraid that many of his hon. Friends around him who shared his opinions upon that point, and who had, on former occasions, voted with him, would vote with his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire that evening, on the ground that they had already found that they could not get rid of all those grants at once, and that they believed, if they were to get rid of Maynooth, all the others would ultimately share the same fate. But how would they share the same fate? Could those Gentlemen imagine for a moment, that if his hon. Friend (Mr. Spooner) and his party were successful in that Motion they would afterwards join them in removing all other endowments? Could any one doubt that the opponents of the Maynooth grant would abandon their liberal allies on the occasion of the discussing the Regium Donum, or any other Protestant endowment? The smallest endowment—he meant the smallest in proportion to the number of the Roman Catholics—and the most necessary endowment—he meant the most necessary from the comparatively greater poverty of the Roman Catholics—would then be withdrawn; but the larger and the less needful endowments would be allowed to remain. He would be no party to such an injustice. He was prepared to vote for the removal of all endowments; but if that vote were not adopted, he should stand by Maynooth, not because he was in favour of Maynooth, for he was as much opposed to it as his hon. Friend himself, but because he would be no party to a line of conduct which he considered would be as unjust and ungenerous as it would be dangerous to the tranquillity and the welfare of the country. He would now beg leave to move the Amendment of which he had given notice. The hon. Gentleman concluded amidst much cheering by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "considering," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "all grants or endowments for ecclesiastical purposes, whether charged on the Consolidated Fund or annually voted by Parliament, with a view to their withdrawal, due regard being had to vested rights or interests," instead thereof.

MR. MURROUGH: Sir, the sin which most easily besets my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire is, that propensity for dwelling on those features of the case which afford the least satisfaction to the observer, which in Den's Theology is designated as a species of morose delight.

But when I call to mind the nature of those morbid anticipations respecting the Report of the Maynooth Commission, in which the English public were taught to indulge, I cannot help rejoicing for the sake of our common Christianity, that both Southern and Pictish fanaticisms have found so little basis for their calumnies.

Loathsome and repugnant to human nature was the description of the studies of this Roman Catholic seminary, which, according to the Royal Commissioners, is

True, it is, that Calvinistic hostility may find in the evidence of Dr. O'Hanlon, and his confusion of spiritual and political duties, some ground for criticism. But, is Ireland the only country in the world in which political theology is known? And is the Roman Catholic the only religion in Ireland in which political theology is inculcated? Nor are Dr. O'Hanlon's opinions so dangerous as at the first blush you may be led to suppose. I am willing to admit, that in a country like England, where the law has not only been long powerful, but long respected, sacerdotal interference in political agitation would be intolerable; but in Ireland, with its anomalies of a Church of one creed, and a population of another, with inhabitants locally connected, but disunited by political aversions, the temporal influence of the priest is by no means an unmixed evil; possibly in some cases that influence may have been abused; but mental influence, even when abused, is far better than the exercise of that physical power which, were it not for the refuge of the priesthood, would be the only remedy of the Irish peasant voter under his numerous and untold oppressions.

Allusions, too, have been made to the nature of the works of St. Alphonso Liguori, and more especially of that which prepares the priest for the duties of the confessional. I acknowledge that its study is repulsive and uncongenial; but the opponents of this grant should have had the candour to admit that it is only placed in the hands of the priest a few days prior to his leaving the College, and the preparation for the mental, like that of the physical anatomy of the human heart, is necessarily to some extent loathsome.

But be the nature of the course of study pursued at Maynooth what it may, it is in conformity with the religion of the great majority of the people of Ireland, and Paley, whom I prefer as an authority to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, lays it down as an incontrovertible axiom, that it is not the business of the State to decide whether a religion be pure or corrupt, true or false, but whether it is in conformity with the wishes of a majority of the people.

This principle has been reduced to practice in Scotland; had it been in Ireland, the conclusion to which we must arrive is manifest and irresistible.

Mr. Murrough

The hon. Gentleman has repudiated all knowledge of the author of that filthy and licentious publication from Glasgow, which has been so freely circulated among the Members of this House, and attempted to divest both himself and those societies with which he is connected from all responsibility on account of its issue. I tell him the onus is not so easily cast off. Wares of this kind would not be furnished were it not for the encouragement of that demand which the political efforts of the hon. Gentleman have tended so greatly to create.

Sir, there are some Members of this House who have thought fit to rest the title to the Maynooth grant on some contract, either express or implied, on the part of the English Government with the Irish people at the Union. When I consider how English contracts with Ireland have been usually fulfilled, I decline to place the Maynooth grant upon so weak and insecure a foundation; for although, when I observe the animosities to which it gives birth, I could wish it abolished, yet until that abolition is the voluntary act of the Irish people and proclaimed by the voice of their representatives, I will not be a party to pilfer this wretched pittance from the clergy of that people who were compelled to maintain an alien Church, the ruins of which, had Irish representatives been more faithful to their country and true to their creed, more observant of their constituents and less pliant to the Minister, would long since have been carted away. For my part, I look upon that Irish Catholic Member who cooperates with any Government which does not make the destruction of the Irish Church a Cabinet question, as little better than a traitor to his country and an apostate to his faith.

But there is a party in this House whose votes on this question I regard with more interest than those even of the representatives for Ireland—I mean the party led by the hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire and the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn. By the hon. Baronet and the noble Lord we have lately been informed that liberality of sentiment is no mere party attribute, but indigenous in our country and common to all; and I, who had fancied it banished from these walls, and knew it to be extinct among the Members of Her Majesty's Government, exulted at the announcement, and in their votes tonight I seek for the evidences of their sincerity. But if not in your justice, in your self-interest be my confidence. This is a Catholic question. With those of three Catholic nations, France, Austria, and Sardinia, your interests are now indissolubly bound. The allegiance of Catholic Ireland by Calvinistic Scotland is still unsuspected. At Alma, Balaklava, and Inkerman, Catholic and Protestant fought side by side, their blood flowed in an undivided stream, their bones have bleached unseparated beneath the snows of a Crimean winter, the same sun rises and sets on their undistinguishable ashes. Ireland is now a bulwark of your strength; pause, ere you convert her into a source of weakness. Your triumphs have already been clouded with disasters and by the follies of a Government, than any disaster far more humiliating; I therefore entreat you in the name of our common country not to add to the perils which without environ us the more fearful calamity of domestic alienation.

MR. A. SMITH said, he thought the number of petitions presented in favour of inquiry into Maynooth showed the strength of public feeling, and justified the Motion of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Spooner). The Roman Catholics were no doubt a large class of our fellow-countrymen, and every one would feel desirous of conceding a little to them, but why, he would ask, should Maynooth receive 26,000*l.* a-year of public money, while Oxford and Cambridge only received about 2,000*l.* a-year? Was the Roman Catholic Church so poor that it could not afford to educate its own priests? No one who looked at the splendid churches and institutions of the Roman Catholics in every part of the world could doubt that they had ample means at their disposal for supplying their Church with priests. The Report of the Maynooth Commissioners showed that half the Irish Roman Catholic clergy were educated at Maynooth, and it was important to inquire whether the Act of 1845 had answered the objects of its authors? That Act was designed to be a measure of conciliation; but how had it been received by the Roman Catholic Church? Why, it was well known that the Papal aggression, as it was termed, had occurred since the passing of that Act. Again, had the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland shown a spirit of increased moderation since this boon was granted to them? Experience proved the reverse of this. It had been asserted that every student who entered Maynooth College was furnished with a Bible; but what was the evidence of the Rev. Mr. O'Callaghan before the Commissioners on that point? That witness stated that he was not aware of the existence of any such rule; that when he entered the College he was not furnished with a Bible; and that he could not obtain one in the establishment to be sworn on when about to take the oath of allegiance. Mr. O'Callaghan also stated that a hatred of England and of Protestantism was the strongest and most predominant feeling among the students at Maynooth while he was there. Now, was this feeling encouraged by the education given or by the example set by the superiors of the college? In 1836, a feast took place at Maynooth to celebrate the visit of the Lord Lieutenant (the Marquess of Normanby). The professors of the college were present, as well as the students, and one would think that the Queen's health would have been proposed on such an occasion; but, no! Mr. O'Connell's health, however, was drunk, and Mr. Whitehead, the professor of logic, spoke to the toast, and made a most violent political speech. Dr. Montague, then the head of the college, was present, as was also Dr. Renahan, the vice-president, the latter of whom (perhaps because he had not the gift of oratory) favoured the company with a song. Was this a fitting way in which to conduct the education of the students? He should conclude by expressing a hope that the House would have a regard to the Protestant feeling of the country on this question—a feeling on which the security of our Protestant institutions and our civil liberty mainly depended.

MR. BLAND said, that this certainly was not a propitious time to designate as idolatry the faith of those nations with whom we were in active alliance. He disapproved of the manner in which the evidence had been quoted and commented upon by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), with less candour than might have been expected from a religious man speaking in that House. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Scholefield) did not, however, go far enough in the principle of religious equality, for it only related to endowments granted by Parliament; if it had extended its operation to the Church of England he should have concurred in it, but as it was he should vote against both the Amendment as well as the original Motion. He considered that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had dealt unfairly with the evidence, which he had was upon this that he grounded his argument that they were not justified in voting money year after year which, as Protestants and men of sense, they must see was not expended in a way beneficial to the people. It had been held that we were bound by some compact which was entered into at the time of the Union. Now, he would yield to none in his desire to fulfil any compact, contract, or agreement. But he would deny that there was any compact entered into at the time of the Union by which we were bound to maintain any such grant, and he called upon those who declared that any such agreement or contract was entered into to produce it. In the Act of Union was the following clause—

"That a sum not less than the sum which has been granted by the Parliament of Ireland, on the average of six years immediately preceding the 1st of January, in the year 1800, in premiums for the internal encouragement of manufactures, or for the maintaining of institutions for pious and charitable purposes, shall be applied, for the period of twenty years after the Union, to such local purposes in Ireland, in such manner as the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall direct."

For twenty years after the 1st January, 1800; and he need not tell the House that the compact which had thus existed had expired more than thirty years ago. This was the only semblance of a compact under which the present grant had been made; and he denied that this country could in any way be considered as bound for the future to make such a grant. Having already referred to the opinion of two eminent and liberal statesmen, he ventured now to quote the opinion of his right hon. Friend the member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), not, he could assure him, for the purpose of taunting him with a change of opinion, for he did not believe that as a question of principle the right hon. Gentleman had changed his opinion at all, even if, unfortunately, he had lent his great talents and the weight of his moral worth to aid the cause of legislation upon expediency instead of upon principle. In that valuable work of his, The Church in its Relations to the State, the right hon. Gentleman made a remark which he never had and never could answer, and with which he (Mr. Horsfall) would now conclude his observations—namely, that "the grant to Maynooth is wholly vicious in principle, and will be a thorn in the side of the people of this country as long as it is continued."

MR. HORSMAN said, he hoped he might be permitted to say, without any Mr. Horsfall

disrespect to the hon. Member who had just sat down, that he did not think the speech of the hon. Gentleman had any direct bearing upon the question immediately before the House. They were certainly not met there to discuss the tenets or the bearings of the Roman Catholic religion. The hon. Member had contrasted the state of crime in Catholic, with that in Protestant countries, but he had put out of sight the Government, the constitution, the police of other countries, and had, as he thought, from the facts adduced by him, come to an unfair conclusion against Catholicism. He (Mr. Horserman) did not look upon this as a religious question at all ; it was a political question only. It was not as if Parliament had now to consider whether they would have the Roman Catholic religion professed by a great body of the Queen's subjects, for this was a matter upon which they had no choice. The question was, whether or not one-third of the subjects of the Queen being of that religion, the policy pursued sixty years ago on this subject by a far-seeing Minister was wise and beneficial ; and whether he was right in determining upon affording an education to the priests of Ireland, who must have great influence over the people of that country, whether you wished it or not, which would make that influence friendly to this country, instead of operating in every respect disadvantageously. He would not, therefore, follow the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) into the theological questions raised by him with reference to the confessional, the law of marriage, or other peculiar tenets of the Roman Catholic Church, feeling as a Protestant that he was far better employed in studying his own religion, instead of wounding the feelings of other people by depreciating and condemning theirs. He felt this to be a much larger question than was comprised in the mere vote of so many thousand pounds a year for the purpose of educating the priests of Ireland. It was a question whether or not they should reverse that system of policy which, during the last twenty-five years, had been adopted towards our fellow-subjects in that country ; and this measure was only one link in a chain of policy, which, he believed, had been alike beneficial to Ireland and honourable to England. He had certainly listened with some curiosity to know how the hon. Member for North Warwickshire could reconcile the statements he had made, and the Motion

he had now submitted to the House, with the Report of the Commission of which the hon. Gentleman might be said to be the parent. Remembering that the question was now for the first time before the House, as it were, in an official form—remembering that year after year the hon. Gentleman had told the House that if they would agree to inquiry—if they would only grant him a Commission—he would prove all he had asserted, he could not consider this a question of feeling so much as a question of fact; and what they had to consider now was, not the general statements in which the hon. Member had again indulged, but the evidence and the Report of this Commission, which the hon. Gentleman at present thought it convenient entirely to ignore. In the first place, he would remind the House what really was the origin of the Maynooth establishment which they were then discussing. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire stated that the endowment was a voluntary one on the part of the English Government, that they gained no advantage by it, and that it was in every respect a voluntary act on their part, and a boon conferred upon the Catholics. Now, without hazarding opinions or indulging in assertions, he (Mr. Horsman) referred to authentic documents, and drew from them a different conclusion. The establishment of the College of Maynooth took place at a time of almost unexampled peril to this country. It was at a time when the Government of England was seriously alarmed by the discontent of the Irish nation, and the embarrassment which this might cause them. It was at a time when we were engaged in a war with France, which was then most disastrous to us, and when we had formed alliances which at that period were falling from us. The French revolution had recently taken place, and the whole of Europe was engaged in a war, the consequence of that revolution. England at that period had suffered reverses which filled the Government with great alarm. The year 1795 commenced, and at the meeting of Parliament there was a description given by the Lord Lansdowne of that day of the results of the last campaign, as stated by the French—

"Twenty-three sieges successfully conducted by them; six pitched battles decisively won; 2,803 cannon taken; 60,000 of the best troops of Europe compelled to surrender prisoners of war, either by capitulation or in the field; 144 towns and cities captured—among them many

That was the state of the war; and, with regard to our alliances, Russia had fallen from us and had concluded a treaty with France. Spain and Holland had also quitted us, and we were in a condition of embarrassment and danger. The Catholics of Ireland availed themselves of the opportunity to petition for the redress of all their grievances, and the Government of England made concessions which, large as they were, were repudiated by the Irish people. Lord Fitzwilliam was then sent over as Lord Lieutenant, but was shortly afterwards recalled; and in an account given by the historian of that day of the temper of the Irish people with regard to the Maynooth establishment and the recall of Lord Fitzwilliam it was stated—

"The resentment of the public was particularly marked on the 25th of March, when Lord Fitzwilliam took his departure from Ireland. It was a day of general gloom; the shops were shut, no business of any kind was transacted, and the whole city put on mourning. His coach was drawn to the waterside by some of the most respectable citizens, and the people seemed intent on every demonstration of grief."

He had now shown the House what was the temper of Ireland and the condition of England in the year in which the establishment of the college of Maynooth was agreed to. The Minister who proposed the endowment was the Tory Minister, William Pitt; and the Parliament which sanctioned it was a Parliament composed exclusively of Protestants, in which the prelates of the Irish Church had seats. At the time the Act was agreed to, religious feeling was much stronger than any feeling in these days, but the establishment of the College of Maynooth was carried through the Parliament without a single dissentient voice, and the measure was assented to by George the Third, the most anti-Catholic monarch that ever sat on the English throne. It must, however, be borne in mind that the measure was not agreed to under a feeling of temporary apprehension, but that it had a far deeper motive and a more long-sighted policy. That which created apprehension in the minds of the English Ministers was the influence which the Irish priest exercised over his flock, and which he exercised according to opinions derived, and on education received, in a foreign country, where he had learnt to imbibe foreign principles hostile both to the religion and constitution of England. It was consequently a matter of policy to withdraw the Irish priest as much as possible from continental associations and principles, and to establish him as much as possible in his own country with kindly feelings towards those among whom he was to live. He must here acknowledge to the hon. member for North Warwickshire that he had a feeling of considerable difficulty in dealing with this question. On the one hand, he felt that great injustice would be done to the Catholics of Ireland if the grant were withdrawn from Maynooth; but, on the other hand, he admitted that a deep feeling of earnestness had gained possession of the minds of a large portion of the people of England which was entitled to the most sincere respect. But, though he felt great difficulty in approaching the discussion of the question, he would, with the permission of the House, quote evidence which must be admitted to be perfectly unimpeachable. At the time of the Union in 1800, few men occupied a more prominent position in consulting with and advising Mr. Pitt, with regard to questions affecting the Roman Catholics, than the then Bishop of Meath, a right reverend prelate who had himself been a Roman Catholic, but who had become a convert to the Protestant faith. The correspondence of the Bishop of Meath with Mr. Pitt had since been published, and it exhibited the prominent part taken by the Bishop in the establishment of the College of Maynooth. In a letter written to Mr. Pitt, in the month of May, at the time of the Union, the Bishop of Meath said—

"The great intention of the institution is to give the Roman Catholic clergy a home education, and prevent them being brought up under that system that was originally framed in foreign seminaries, for the purpose of supplying a succession of men who are so necessarily connected with the great body of the people to reside in the very heart of the country, prejudiced against its constitution, leagued against its Government, and intimately connected with its enemies, and to take care that no civil prejudices at least should be engrailed on their religious opinions. It is, therefore, evident that, to secure the objects of the institution, every means should be taken to prevent the Romish clergy of the kingdom from resorting to foreign seminaries for their professional education."

There would be no difficulty in quoting document upon document to show that the education of the Irish priesthood was an important consideration with Government and the leading men of the country at the time Maynooth was endowed, and that the establishment of Maynooth, instead of being, as represented by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Spooner), a mere boon to the Irish people, without the Government having received anything in return for it, was a matter of State policy, called for by the dangers and exigencies of the times. The endowment of Maynooth took place in the year 1795, and five years later the Union took place. All that had been previously done in respect to Maynooth was ratified by the Union; and in the Act of 1800 it was distinctly specified that one object of the Union was "the establishing, supporting, and endowing of the College of Maynooth." The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Horsfall), and also the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, had referred to an argument often used in that House, that the establishment of Maynooth was no matter of distinct contract with the Irish nation. He (Mr. Horsman) had no wish to stand solely upon the question whether there had been a distinct contract or not, because he thought he could show the House on much stronger grounds that there was an obligation to continue the establishment of Maynooth. He had been somewhat surprised at the sort of evidence brought forward by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire to show that there had not been a contract. The hon. Gentleman quoted a speech of Sir Robert Peel in 1845, applicable only to the Bill of 1845, in which Sir Robert Peel stated that the measure he then proposed had been brought forward upon no understanding with the Irish priesthood or hierarchy, upon no contract in any sense of the word, but as a mere question of policy. Now it had never been said that the contract originated with Sir Robert Peel and commenced in 1845, but it was contended that the original contract was made in 1795 and was confirmed in 1800, at the time of the Union. To show the opinion entertained of the endowment of Maynooth when it was first granted, he would quote the opinion of Mr. Perceval. No prominent public man had taken a greater part against the Catholics of Ireland than Mr. Perceval, and no one had spoken more frequently or more strongly against this very endowment of Maynooth, and yet, though all his feelings, all his prejudices were against the grant, and though all his antecedents pledged him to oppose and repeal it, this was the apology he made for not assenting to that course—

"As the Irish Parliament thought such a measure of policy advisable, he was still willing to retain the principle of meeting that determination; indeed, the united Legislature were bound by the principles of good faith to continue the grant."

In 1812, four years afterwards, the question was again brought before the House of Commons, and Mr. Perceval, who was still a Minister of the Crown, expressed himself in these words—

"He supported the grant as it stood, because it was one of those which the Parliament of Ireland thought wise to preserve at the Union, because he found it, in fact, given over to England as a part of the Union. If the grant had been fairly open to opposition after the Union, he certainly should have been disposed to resist it."

The grant was continued from that time until 1845, when the question was again brought before Parliament by the late Sir Robert Peel, who took what he (Mr. Horsman) considered a wise and just view of the subject. Sir Robert Peel said, that if Parliament pledged themselves to establish an institution for the education of the priesthood of Ireland they ought not to keep that word of promise merely to the letter, but to carry it out in spirit; and if they gave such an institution it ought to be adequate to the purpose for which it was established. It had been shown that the establishment of Maynooth was very inadequate, that the students were in a state of great misery, and that the professors were very ill paid. Sir Robert Peel therefore said, with great justice—"Either do away with the institution altogether, or make it effective for the purposes for which it was established." On that occasion the House of Commons assented to the views of Sir Robert Peel; the Bill which was introduced was passed in that House; and it was confided in the House of Lords to the guardianship of a noble and eminent colleague of Sir Robert Peel, the present Earl of Derby, then Lord Stanley, who, in urging their Lordships to adopt the measure, delivered a most eloquent, powerful, and convincing speech, with some extracts from which he (Mr. Horsman) would venture to trouble the House. Lord Stanley said—

"They had now to deal with a case in which the population were Roman Catholics, and would be Roman Catholics; and they had to consider whether they should be instructed Roman Catholics or ignorant Roman Catholics; whether they would have those Roman Catholics educated by priests well instructed and well affected to the Government which took them by the hand, or not. Let them look at it in either way, and he would say that, as Christians as well as politicians, they were obliged to consider it, and in that light he looked on it as wise, and just, and prudent, to give their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects the best religious education they could afford them, according to the forms of worship which they observed, and which their creed would permit them to receive at the hands of the Government or the Legislature. . . . The decision rested with their Lordships. He could not place too highly before them the responsibility that would be incurred by a rejection of this measure—a responsibility far greater than if that measure had never been introduced. But he had no such fear—he knew their Lordships would look to this question as statesmen, as Christians, and as men desirous of securing by the firmest hold the union, not the Legislative union, but the real and substantial union between all classes of the people of this empire, divided as they might be in religious faith. And while he could not express the alarm and dismay which the rejection of this measure would occasion in his mind, he had too high a sense of the wisdom, justice, and patriotism of the illustrious assemblage which he addressed, to dread that they would involve the country in the fearful consequences which he apprehended."—[3 Hansard, lxxi. 111, 115-16.]

Now, he (Mr. Horsman) did not ask whether this was a contract legally binding upon the two parties, and he would not even ask the hon. Member for North Warwickshire whether, if the Union had never taken place, he thought the Irish Parliament would have repealed the enactment. He (Mr. Horsman) would rather depend upon material facts than upon technical distinctions, and he would ask the House to consider whether, after the grant had continued for sixty years, they were prepared to abandon it upon the grounds urged by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire? He called upon the House to remember that the grant was made at a time of great national difficulty and danger; and he asked them to recollect who were the Ministers by whom it was proposed, the Monarch by whom it was sanctioned, the Legislature by which it was adopted, and the successive Administrations by which it had been supported. He asked hon. Gentlemen to remember that no leading man, on either side of the House, who had been entrusted with the conduct of public affairs, had supported the withdrawal of this grant, and he called upon them to consider the consequences that might result from withdrawing the grant upon the ground that the religion of those to whose use it was appropriated was erroneous. After Parliament had sanctioned this grant, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, feeling that at that time it was impossible successfully to propose its repeal, asked Parliament to institute an inquiry into the state of Maynooth College, and undertake to show that the teaching at Maynooth differed from that which was originally established, that its tendency was immoral, and that the establishment was a national pest. Well, an inquiry took place; the evidence which had been given was before the House; and he (Mr. Horsman) thought it was most important that the Catholics who had been assailed, and the Protestants who had been alarmed, should know whether or not the statements which had been made by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had been borne out by the investigation of that Commission. He had been struck with the fact, that throughout the speech of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire he had not made a single allusion to the Report of the Commissioners, and in only two instances had he referred to the evidence. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Spooner) had told them that the preparation of the speech he had made to-night had cost him laborious days and sleepless nights, and that he had felt obliged to obtain the assistance of gentlemen of eminent ability. Considering how much the hon. Gentleman had promised and how little he had performed, he (Mr. Horsman) sympathised with him both in his difficulties and in his disappointment. The hon. Gentleman had assuredly had his opportunity, and it appeared to him (Mr. Horsman) that those whom the hon. Member assailed had as assuredly had their revenge. He had felt some surprise that the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire, with the enormous mass of evidence which he had before him, had spoken for two hours and ten minutes before he had in any way referred to it. He had listened to his speech with great attention, and had thought at every moment, now comes the plunge, but two hours and ten minutes actually elapsed before it was really made; and when the hon. Gentleman did refer to the evidence—and in doing so he was very feeling and pathetic—he only touched upon two cases. The hon. Gentleman, in the first instance, complained that in a Return laid before Parliament the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh was designated by his Ecclesiastical title; but how could that be construed into a charge against the College of Maynooth? He then appealed to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, and said, that if he would not admit that that assumption of title was a transgression of the law, he was unfit to continue in the office which he held. Now, his recollection of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill led him to a conclusion different to that arrived at by the hon. Gentleman. According to his idea of that Act, the Archbishop of Armagh would come within the scope of it if he himself assumed an ecclesiastical title, but not because another person chose to invest him with one, and he could not therefore think that his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland was unfit for his position if he did not admit that because he was so designated the Archbishop of Armagh was guilty of a transgression of the law. The next charge made by the hon. Gentleman was, that a great portion of the evidence of Mr. Matthew Flannagan was suppressed, and that advantage had been taken of the permission usually accorded to a witness by a Committee of that House to revise his evidence, of effecting that object. What was the authority of the hon. Gentleman for that charge? An anonymous witness. The hon. Gentleman founded that charge upon an anonymous letter, written by a person whom he did not know, but whose respectability would, he said, be vouched for by two very respectable gentlemen, who also did not wish their names to be made known, but who would have no objection to appear before a Committee of the House of Lords. It appeared then, that the hon. Gentleman on the authority of an anonymous writer, whose respectability was vouched for by two gentlemen who were also, as regarded the House, equally anonymous, made a charge that the indulgence usually accorded by a Committee to a witness of revising his evidence had been abused. Now what was the extent of the abuse of that privilege? The hon. Gentlemen said, that the answers of Mr. Flannagan to seven questions had been compressed into one answer by the secretary, and the hon. Gentleman had read those seven answers. Now, he had read the one answer, and he had been unable to see that it differed in any material respect from the seven answers read by the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman had said, that the evidence of Mr. Flannagan had been condensed, in order to perpetuate a job, but, in his opinion, it would be of great advantage, if not only the evidence on this subject were condensed, but also the speeches. But, be that as it might, he could not see that either the case of the Archbishop of Armagh or of Mr. Flannagan could in any way be brought forward as charges against the grant to Maynooth College. The hon. Gentleman then quoted two passages from the evidence, and, as it was likely to give rise to delusion if from a mass of evidence extracts were taken, he would only refer to the witnesses which had been adduced by the hon. Gentleman, and he hoped to be able to show that those very witnesses had made statements adverse to the conclusion at which he had arrived. The hon. Gentleman had referred to an answer given by Mr. O'Hanlon as a proof of the recognition by the Roman Catholics of the temporal power of the Pope, but the hon. Gentleman had entirely lost sight of the answer given by the same witness to the previous question. The question was put—

"What is the doctrine taught in the Maynooth College on the subject of the authority of the Pope or the Church in matters of a civil or temporal nature?"

The answer was—

"We teach in Maynooth, that the Pope has no temporal power whatever, direct or indirect. We have affirmed that doctrine upon our solemn oaths, and we firmly maintain it in the College of Maynooth. We hold the same doctrine in regard to the Church."

He should not have quoted from the evidence of Mr. O'Hanlon, had not the hon. Gentleman done so; but he (Mr. Horsman) thought, that when the hon. Gentleman quoted a long answer of Mr. O'Hanlon, in order to prove that the doctrine of the temporal power of the Pope was inculcated at Maynooth, he was justified in quoting a short answer in which that doctrine was most clearly and distinctly denied. He must confess that he had been rather surprised at the next question referred to by the hon. Gentleman which had been put to and answered by the Rev. Mr. O'Hanlon. The question was put—

"The Index is not received, and therefore imposes no obligation in this country. Dr. Murray, the late Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Doyle, and, as well as I can recollect, Dr. Curtis the Archbishop of Armagh, and Dr. Kelly, Archbishop of Tuam, declared, upon their oaths, in the House of Lords, in the year 1825, that neither the 'Bulla Oenae,' nor the Index, was received in Ireland, and I am sure they have not been received since that period. The Index, therefore, induces no obligation upon us; but, as clergymen belonging to an ecclesiastical institution, we feel ourselves constrained to defer to the expressed wishes of the Pope."

And from that answer the hon. Gentleman jumped to the conclusion that, because the College of Maynooth allowed the Pope to have a voice as to the books which were to be used in the college, the teachers of that college admitted his temporal power and his right to absolve British subjects from their allegiance to the Queen. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire was followed by the hon. and learned Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop), who seconded his Motion, though he hardly thought the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Spooner), could have derived much comfort from the way in which that was done. The hon. and learned Member for Greenock supported the repeal of the grant to Maynooth because he wanted to destroy the Established Church. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire said the Roman Catholics would destroy the Church unless we repealed this grant, while the hon. and learned Member for Greenock said, Maynooth was one of the strongest buttresses of the Established Church, and he wanted to destroy the buttress in order that he might the easier bring down the Church. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire appealed to the Dissenters, who, he said, would be placed under the supremacy of the Roman Catholics if this grant was not repealed, and called upon them to support the Established Church, under which so many privileges were enjoyed. The hon. and learned Member for Greenock, on the other hand, said they ought to join the Catholics of Ireland and assist them in bringing down the Established Church. Such was the congruity of sentiment that existed between the mover and the seconder of this motion. But the hon. and learned Member for Greenock also appealed to the evidence, though with great caution, and he likewise did not venture to say one word with respect to the Report. The hon. and learned Gentleman alluded to the opinions of the Rev. Mr. O'Hanlon as to the interference of priests in election matters; but he forgot that Mr. O'Hanlon had distinctly stated that he never taught any doctrine on the subject, his opinions being mere abstract opinions, without any authority whatever. He was asked—

"Do you admit the doctrine of Maynooth a priori, inasmuch as it is such a doctrine as makes it difficult to believe he is acting in accordance with his remonstrance?"

I have never discussed the question, or touched upon it at all. I can have, however, no hesitation in stating that, in my opinion, the priest in his ecclesiastical capacity, should confine himself to the explanation and inculcation of the duties of the electors. If the electors require information or instruction, as they do frequently in many parts of Ireland, I think the priest, as such, is not only justified, but bound to teach and explain their duties."

This was a conclusion very different from that which the hon. and learned Member for Greenock wished to draw from the opinion of the witness. Another witness whom he quoted was the Rev. Dr. Moriarty, to show that the Pope had great power in electoral matters. Now he found that Dr. Moriarty was asked this question :—

"Supposing the Pope were to issue a bull, declaring that circumstances had now arisen in this country which released the people from the duty of allegiance, would that justify a subject in rebelling?"—My answer is, that a Catholic should deem the case impossible, for he could not suppose the Pope capable of such an absurdity."

Then he was asked—

"But suppose it did occur!—If you suppose the decree given in the present circumstances of the country it would be of no force, as being manifestly founded in error; but I again protest against the supposition as disrespectful to the Holy See.

"Suppose the Pope were to declare that, in consequence of the establishment of the Queen's Colleges, and in consequence of the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, the time had arrived, and circumstances had arisen, under which the Irish Roman Catholics were at liberty to rebel, would that in any measure terminate the duty of or in any manner affect its obligation?"—I must again answer by protesting against the supposition. Such are not the circumstances which to a Catholic mind would justify rebellion. If the case occurred, I would simply conclude that the Pope had gone mad."

This was the witness who was quoted to support the opinions of the hon. and learned Member for Greenock. So much then for the evidence, and so much for the Report of the Commissioners, in so far as they had been adverted to by the two hon. Members to whom he had referred. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire having called for inquiry was not disposed to abide by its results; and the question was whether he himself having professed so much—whether when what he had stated most strongly he had stated most erroneously, and when he charged most fiercely he had charged most unjustly—he was now entitled to ask the House to come to a conclusion directly at variance with the Report of the Commissioners?

The hon. Gentleman said he cared nothing for the inquiry—he cared nothing for the Report; he objected to the endowment of Popery as the endowment of error, and upon that ground distinctly and solely he asked the House to discontinue this grant. But this was to raise the whole question of the policy of this country since 1795, and the question came to be whether this was an isolated instance in which we made payments for the benefit of the Catholic and other religions? He held in his hand a list of the Parliamentary grants that were made to other religions than the religion established by law—payments made not only to Catholics and Dissenters, but to denominations that were not Christians at all. We made large payments to English Catholic schools; to Catholic chaplains employed by the Admiralty for the benefit of Catholic seamen—to Catholic chaplains employed by the Horse Guards, and for the military; for our colonial fellow-subjects; for prisons in Ireland, lunatic asylums, poorhouses, and county prisons. He found, also, payment given to schools for teaching the children of Jews. The principle on which these grants for education were given was, that the money was not the money of Protestants only, but contributed by all the subjects of the realm; and they were given on the ground that the education of the children was a national concern, that they were receiving a moral and religious education which was conducive to the improvement and advantage of the State. In 1829 they passed the Emancipation Act; in 1831 they sanctioned another enactment which added immensely to the power of Roman Catholics in Ireland; in 1844, Roman Catholics were appointed members of boards for superintending charitable trusts; and in 1845 they sanctioned the measure of Sir Robert Peel with respect to Maynooth. Were not these successive measures a tacit recognition that Roman Catholics had obtained their political rights, not by underhand intrigue or violence, but by the constitutional voice of their representatives in Parliament. They had compelled them to grant those political rights, they had compelled them to acknowledge their national religion, they had wrung from them these concessions one after another, and the present was not so much a question of an annual grant for the purpose of educating the priesthood as an acknowledgment that the national religion of Ireland was a matter of national care, and had the same right to protection as other denominations. They must look at this question as statesmen, and not as sectarians. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had said that no man in that House was more tolerant with respect to his Catholic fellow-subjects than himself. He (Mr. Horsman) must confess that in that case he hardly knew what was meant by the expression of "Protestant toleration of our Catholic fellow-subjects." They must remember that the population of these islands, the subjects of Queen Victoria, were divided in their religion; that in England the majority were Protestants, and in Ireland Catholics; if they took the population of the two islands, undoubtedly the majority would be of the Protestant faith, but if they took the population of the whole Christian world, they would find an immense majority of Catholics. How, then was the question to be settled, seeing that neither would defer to the arguments of the other party? Were the two parties to be drawn out against each other in perpetual hostility? That system had surely been tried long enough. Up to the year 1829, they tried all they could do by severity and proscription; since 1829 they had tried what they could effect by conciliation, and, as experience had shown, with the greatest possible success. Since 1829 they had attempted to adapt the legislation to the real condition of the country, and the attempt had been followed by the most important results. He could not see on what ground the grant to Maynooth was to be regarded as a matter of favour which the Government were entitled to withdraw at pleasure. Neither the number nor the character of the Irish people, who, after passing through a long period of adversity and distress, still remained the equals of Englishmen in all the qualities that stimulated ambition or commanded success, warranted such an inference. They were not the people so inferior either in number or qualities that we might condescend to "tolerate" them. He totally repudiated the word. The hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to draw a distinction between the population and the priesthood of Ireland. True, he had paid some compliments to the Catholic population, but he had qualified those compliments by strong censure, and, with regard to the priesthood, he (Mr. Horsman) felt that great injustice had been done them on account of their having taken part in political contests. Now, in estimating the character of the priesthood, it must not be forgotten that

Ireland had been for centuries torn by faction, that the religion of the people had been strenuously attacked, and that it was therefore natural that the priests should come forward to the van and be foremost in the battle. Besides that, circumstances had drawn the Irish people and the Irish priests into unusually close relations. To whom had the peasant had to look for centuries? They could not say that the landlord had been his friend. They had been estranged by the difference in their faith. Nor could it be said that the law had been his friend, for he had long known the law only by its privations and its proscriptions. Nor could he look to the Government as his friend; for the only experience he had had of its action was for a long period in its penalties and severities. In such times as these the peasant not unnaturally felt that the priest—sprung, be it remembered, from his own rank—was the only friend he had to look to. And he believed that in his efforts to promote the well-being of those committed to his charge, the Irish priest had done his duty conscientiously and assiduously. In all their trials, in all their difficulties, in all their dangers, there had existed the closest tie between the priest and the peasant, and he believed, whether acting right or wrong, it had always been the desire of the latter to promote, as much as possible, the welfare of the Irish population. He did not hesitate to say, that he sympathised with every faith that was the object of persecution, and with every man who was the victim of oppression. So far from thinking it was necessary to apologise for the course he had taken, it was for hon. Gentlemen opposite to apologise for the course they had taken. It was for those to apologise who had made Protestantism the cloak for injustice and the instrument of wrong, and who had exhibited it to the world in invidious features. It was for them to show that their practice was conformable to the principles of the religion they professed. Persecution had been a heavy blow and great discouragement to Protestantism in Ireland, and the more he venerated his religion the more he would elevate it by attending to those precepts of charity and justice on which he thought it was founded. Vindicating for himself the right of judgment, he would give that right freely to all who differed from him. It was in the interest of peace that he opposed this Motion, because he thought the religion he professed was the religion of peace.

It was for the interest of charity and good will that he opposed this motion, because charity and good will were the precepts of religion in which he was brought up, and the more he venerated that religion, and the more he desired to uphold, elevate, and exalt it in the eyes of others, the more he wished to have it admired as the instrument of peace, instead of being detested as the emblem of injustice. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire had thought it necessary to make some observations with respect to the time at which he had brought forward this Motion, and he (Mr. Horsman) must also say, that the time he considered was most inappropriate. They now, for the first time they could remember in the history of Ireland, witnessed a degree of peace, prosperity, and tranquillity, such as they had never before beheld. After years of every kind of suffering and calamity a ray of sunshine had appeared in that country, which some years ago they could not anticipate. The peasantry were industrious, the proprietary were thriving, there was peace where there had been war, there was security where there had been danger, there was no political agitation, everything, as far as they could see, promised a future which it was impossible to look forward to without hope and satisfaction, and he felt it was unfortunate on such an occasion that these causes of dissension, discord, and strife should be raised, in connection with a question the most dangerous of all, because it was connected with the religious susceptibilities of the nation. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the safety of the Throne, the integrity of the empire, and the happiness of the Queen's subjects as being involved in this question, and he threw on the House the responsibility of rejecting it; but he (Mr. Horsman) said let the responsibility of bringing the subject forward fall upon the hon. Member. Let his be the honour and glory of sowing dissension and discord where peace now prevailed, and of raising all those questions which it had been the desire, the aim, and the effort of successive statesmen for years past to endeavour to set at rest. He (Mr. Horsman) and, he hoped also, the majority of that House, were prepared to take on themselves the responsibility of promoting that system of legislation which he thought had conduced to uphold the character of the Legislature and of the nation, and to vindicate and raise our national religion in times not without difficulty. He trusted, that in times of peace and prosperity to Ireland they would enjoy the fruits of having wisely and impartially administered the affairs of Ireland, and that they might be able to say of the Queen of England, that it was her glory in peace and her strength in war, that she reigned in the hearts and spoke with the voice of a well-governed and united people.

Mr. NAPIER said, that as this question had been brought before the House, it was impossible for any hon. Member to avoid pronouncing a judgment and opinion on it. Though, as a member of the Established Church, he could not concur in the doctrines of the Roman Catholics, he was ready to argue this question as the right hon. Member the Secretary for Ireland had put it—simply as a political question. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the House was now called on to disendow what had been endowed under the peculiar circumstances of 1795. But the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would not touch the Act passed at that period, which did not endow at all, but was simply permissive, enabling the parties to receive subscriptions and donations for the voluntary support of the college. Subsequently, annual votes were passed as donations, but this Motion merely called upon the House of Commons to take into consideration the present endowment out of the Consolidated Fund, which was created by the Act of 1845. With respect to the priesthood of Ireland who were educated at that college, what had been the description given of them by the noble Lord opposite last year, when the Motion was made with respect to the Six-Mile Bridge affair? He admitted that if any clergyman in England had done half what the two priests then had done, the country would have been convulsed from John O'Groat's to Land's End; and, in answer to an hon. Gentleman, who naturally inquired why they were not prosecuted, the noble Lord said that, perhaps, they were not worse than any other of the priests in Ireland. What had been the further description given by Lord Clarendon in his celebrated letter to Lord Shrewsbury? It had been said that the Index Expurgatorius was not enforced in Ireland. If so, why had Bailly's book been expelled from the College of Maynooth? The evidence in 1825 and 1855 was not very consistent. With regard to the bull, In Cœna Domini, one witness is asked whether it was in force in Ireland? He said it was not. On being asked why, he answered, because the Roman Catholic bishops examined in 1825 had said so. But did they? Dr. Doyle, in his examination, insinuated that the bull was not in force, that it had been rejected in every Christian country in Europe. He was asked, was it in force in 1793? He said it might have been and subsequently, but that it was not then in force. But what did Cardinal Erskine say to Sir John Cox Hippesley in 1793? He told him that it was in force in all cases where no impediment existed. Therefore, it was in force always in Ireland. But that bull was the standard of all the cases reserved to the Pope; and, moreover, it raised the most important question of all—what was the canon law adopted in Ireland? He (Mr. Napier) challenged any man to say authoritatively what the canon law was as it was in force in Ireland. The professors of Maynooth taught it without any restriction; but in a compilation of authentic references, to which the name of the Vice Chancellor of Cambridge was appended, he found that the canon law, as taught in Maynooth, was largely in conflict with the constitution of the country, and that it established in temporal matters the Pope's spiritual authority. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) said the Pope had no temporal power in these countries; but this volume showed that it was a supreme spiritual power in temporal things; and the Gallican Church, which understood the case better than the right hon. Gentleman, had taken the distinction between temporal power and power in temporal things. One of the witnesses was asked if the Pope had any power over conscience. He said, no, except it was a case of conscience? But, in the answer to the next question, he declared that the canon law was the rule of conscience, and no one would tell what the canon law was. The professor was examined as to the body of that law published by the Bishops in 1832, and asked whether the bull, In Cœna Domini, was reprinted in it. He said it was, but that his copy had been printed in Belgium. The Irish Roman Catholic Prelates had, however, given their sanction to its publication, and there were plenty of copies of it in Ireland. With respect to this grant to Maynooth, the Government and Parliament had got into a false position, and they must get out of it, whatever might be the consequence. Great importance was attached to the election of free students for Maynooth, but by whom were they elected? By Dr. Cullen, and the other ultramontane archbishops, who were appointed specially by the Pope. He was the Pope's legate, and was appointed the head of the Synod held in Ireland. The first thing he had to do in that capacity was to administer an oath to every member of the Synod, by which they were bound to obey the Pope and enforce the Canons. So that they had these men in effect swearing that they would carry out the canon law. He would appeal to the common sense of the House whether they would support an institution by means of which they would enable these men to spread ultramontanism and carry out the canon law, which was declared to be contrary to the laws of this country? It might be illegal to act according to the canon law, and might subject the transgressors to punishment. Why, then, he would ask, should they go on educating people in error, and allowing them to be taught to obey the canon law, and then afterwards punish them for doing so? Looking at the question as a matter of policy and of plain common sense, he would ask whether the Act of 1845 had turned out satisfactorily? He believed it had not, and that it was, therefore, well worth their while again to reconsider the subject. He could very well understand many persons saying—"We don't give this money for the purpose of teaching erroneous doctrines, but we give it to enable the Roman Catholic priesthood to get a better secular education, that they might be more qualified than they now are to minister to the Roman Catholic population of Ireland." The State policy of this measure of the Maynooth grant was first to get a domestic and well-educated priesthood, in order that the people might not be left in the hands of those who were not competent to teach them; and the next object was to have a loyal body of men attached to the constitution. But had they succeeded in these two objects? With regard to the first, the evidence showed how it had failed; and, in respect to the second object, he had shown that the students of Maynooth were taught to recognise the whole body of the canon law without check or control. He thought that Parliament was in such a false position that nothing could save them but a frank and searching review of the past, which should be done in such a way as would respect the rights of all parties. They had tried a great experiment. A

Commission had been issued to ascertain whether, as a matter of State policy, that experiment had succeeded or had proved a failure. He thought that the result of the labours of that Commission showed, as far as the grant to Maynooth was concerned, the failure of the experiment. But, looking at the grant in another point of view, he could not help regarding it as an insult to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. It was, in fact, offering a bribe of 30,000*l.* a year to keep the Roman Catholic clergy quiet. He hoped the House would consent to go into Committee to consider the proposition of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire; but if, when it should be laid before them, it should appear to him that it could not be carried into effect consistently with justice, he should be the last man to give it his sanction.

On the Motion of Mr. Serjeant O'BRIEN,

MISSION TO VIENNA.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he would now beg to move the Address of which he had given notice for Returns of the expenses of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to his Lordship's mission to Vienna. He understood that the number of individuals attending upon the noble Lord upon his mission amounted to thirty-two—male and female. He certainly had never heard that it was the custom for ladies to be sent on foreign missions. He had no wish whatever to stint the noble Lord of anything which could conduce to his comfort, but the people, from whose pockets the money came, had a right to know what the cost of this mission was, the more especially as it had been a total failure. He hoped, therefore, that the whole expenses would be stated fairly and without concealment, whether they referred to luxuries, comforts, or recreation, or whether they were for purposes connected with the public service.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Returns of the Expenses of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to his Lordship's Mission to Vienna and Conference with the other Missionaries of France, Austria, and the Sublime Porte, there assembled for Negotiation and Treaty with Russia for the restoration of Peace."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could not agree to this Motion, the object

of which clearly was to cast an imputation on his noble Friend of which he was not deserving. [Colonel SIBTHORP: No, no!] The Motion was totally without precedent. If the hon. and gallant Colonel could state any reason why Parliament should inquire into the expenses of this mission, that would be a ground for departing from the usual course. The expenses of missions of this kind were always stated in the return of Civil Contingencies laid before the House, and a sum was usually taken to cover them in the Estimate for Civil Contingencies. His noble Friend had only just returned from his mission, and the accounts were not yet sent in, but, when they were sent in and presented in the return to Parliament in the usual way, he would undertake to say that they would be found to be in no way beyond the ordinary and usual amount of expenses of the same kind. It must be remembered that in the case of extraordinary missions such as this the bare expenses only were allowed, and no salary or emolument whatever was paid to the Minister or Ambassador performing the duties. The Motion could only be intended as a vote of censure upon the noble Lord; it was a total departure from precedent, for which no Parliamentary reason whatever had been assigned, and he should therefore not consent to the production of any such return.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he was convinced from the noble Viscount's refusal to grant this return that the Government were afraid to lay an account of the expense of this mission before the House. He would leave the public to draw their own inferences, but for his part he looked upon it as an underhand, low piece of business, and he washed his hand of it altogether.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, May 2, 1855.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT.—For Renfrewshire, v. Colonel Mure, Chiltern Hundreds.
PUBLIC BILL.—2<sup>d</sup> Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment.

EDUCATION (No. 2) BILL.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Mr. Speaker, when I applied for leave to introduce this Bill, of which I am now about to move the second reading, I stated the objects which I had in view, and the nature of the measure, at so much length, that I had not intended to intrude upon the patience of the House to-day in moving the second reading ; I intended rather to reserve myself to answer any objections that may be made to the measure in the course of the discussion. I will, Sir, however, venture for a few moments to request the attention of the House, in consequence of having reason to believe that the real objects I have in view, and the nature of the measure itself, have been a good deal misunderstood. I think it is most advisable, as we are to divide to-day upon the principles of the Bill, that hon. Gentlemen should know what those principles really are. While, on the one hand, I have no desire whatever to conciliate support upon false pretences, I should, on the other hand, be sorry if this Bill should be opposed under any mistake or misapprehension as to what are its real scope and intentions. In the first place, although I feel I have no right to claim the attention of the House upon this question, having previously stated my views at some length on the introduction of the measure, I yet hope that in endeavouring to meet a great national evil, I may ask the House to put a favourable construction upon an attempt to remove that evil—an attempt which at first sight may appear presumptuous, but which, at all events, is made with a perfect singleness of purpose. Sir, the object of this Bill is one of immense importance, and of immense difficulty. I seek by this Bill no less an object than this—I seek, at any rate ultimately, to bring a good school within the reach of every door. Now, then, what are the principles by which I seek to accomplish that great object ? First of all, this Bill rests upon the principle that we are bound by our duty, with respect to the national character and its preservation, to extend and improve the existing means of education. My second principle is, that in, deference to what I consider to be a Christian duty, and to what I believe to be the feeling of the people, that improved and extended education ought to be religious. My third principle is, that, in seeking to provide an extended and religious education for the population of this country, divided as it is in religious belief, the measure should be founded upon principles of the most perfect toleration. By toleration I mean—to borrow a phrase used in some of the petitions this day presented to the House—perfect religious liberty and perfect and equal regard to the feelings of all religious denominations, and complete liberty of conscience. These, then, are the three principles upon which this Bill rests. With regard to the machinery by which I propose to carry these out, it rests upon what I may call two principles. The first is, that these great objects shall be mainly effected by means of a public fund, which fund is to be constituted by local contributions, together with grants from this House. The second principle upon which my machinery rests is, that these funds shall be administered by means of local boards, popularly elected, acting upon that principle of self-government which we have so much at heart, embracing within them the most educated and competent classes of the country ; but that these local boards, which are to watch over, to guide, and to foster education in the several districts, shall be superintended by a central department, duly representing and responsible to this House, and thus to carry out a principle closely analogous to that great measure by which the relief of the poor of this country is administered. These, Sir, are the principles upon which I, this day, ask the House to pronounce an opinion. I have earnestly to express a hope that your votes will be given upon these principles, and that you will not allow yourselves, in considering these principles, to be embarrassed upon questions of detail which ought properly to be reserved for discussion and examination when we are in Committee. I will now, Sir, briefly allude to certain misapprehensions with which I am told this Bill has been received. I am told that in respect to the third principle upon which the Bill rests, namely, perfect toleration to all religious denominations, that there are some persons who, agreeing with me in my views so far, nevertheless think that I am running the risk of endangering everything like a religious education, that I have taken no security whatever against secular schools being maintained under my Bill ; and, above all, that I have said nothing in the Bill as to the necessity of the reading of the Holy Scriptures in the schools. Now if that objection were really well founded, I confess I should consider it a most serious one. Such, however, is not my intention, and such I contend is not the tendency or the real meaning of the clauses referred to. But if any hon. Gentleman considers them open to this objec-

state of Maynooth College, and undertake to show that the teaching at Maynooth differed from that which was originally established, that its tendency was immoral, and that the establishment was a national pest. Well, an inquiry took place; the evidence which had been given was before the House; and he (Mr. Horsman) thought it was most important that the Catholics who had been assailed, and the Protestants who had been alarmed, should know whether or not the statements which had been made by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had been borne out by the investigation of that Commission. He had been struck with the fact, that throughout the speech of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire he had not made a single allusion to the Report of the Commissioners, and in only two instances had he referred to the evidence. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Spooner) had told them that the preparation of the speech he had made to-night had cost him laborious days and sleepless nights, and that he had felt obliged to obtain the assistance of gentlemen of eminent ability. Considering how much the hon. Gentleman had promised and how little he had performed, he (Mr. Horsman) sympathised with him both in his difficulties and in his disappointment. The hon. Gentleman had assuredly had his opportunity, and it appeared to him (Mr. Horsman) that those whom the hon. Member assailed had as assuredly had their revenge. He had felt some surprise that the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire, with the enormous mass of evidence which he had before him, had spoken for two hours and ten minutes before he had in any way referred to it. He had listened to his speech with great attention, and had thought at every moment, now comes the plunge, but two hours and ten minutes actually elapsed before it was really made; and when the hon. Gentleman did refer to the evidence—and in doing so he was very feeling and pathetic—he only touched upon two cases. The hon. Gentleman, in the first instance, complained that in a Return laid before Parliament the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh was designated by his Ecclesiastical title; but how could that be construed into a charge against the College of Maynooth? He then appealed to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, and said, that if he would not admit that that assumption of title was a transgression of the law, he was unfit to continue in the office which he held. Now, his recollection of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill led him to a conclusion different to that arrived at by the hon. Gentleman. According to his idea of that Act, the Archbishop of Armagh would come within the scope of it if he himself assumed an ecclesiastical title, but not because another person chose to invest him with one, and he could not therefore think that his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland was unfit for his position if he did not admit that because he was so designated the Archbishop of Armagh was guilty of transgression of the law. The next charge made by the hon. Gentleman was, that a great portion of the evidence of Mr. Matthew Flannagan was suppressed, and that advantage had been taken of the permission usually accorded to a witness by a Committee of that House to revise his evidence, of effecting that object. What was the authority of the hon. Gentleman for that charge? An anonymous witness. The hon. Gentleman founded that charge upon an anonymous letter, written by a person whom he did not know, but whose respectability would, he said, be vouched for by two very respectable gentlemen, who also did not wish their names to be made known, but who would have no objection to appear before a Committee of the House of Lords. It appeared then, that the hon. Gentleman on the authority of an anonymous writer, whose respectability was vouched for by two gentlemen who were also, as regarded the House, equally anonymous, made a charge that the indulgence usually accorded by a Committee to a witness of revising his evidence had been abused. Now what was the extent of the abuse of that privilege? The hon. Gentlemen said, that the answers of Mr. Flannagan to seven questions had been compressed into one answer by the secretary, and the hon. Gentleman had read those seven answers. Now, he had read the one answer, and he had been unable to see that it differed in any material respect from the seven answers read by the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman had said, that the evidence of Mr. Flannagan had been condensed, in order to perpetuate a job, but, in his opinion, it would be of great advantage, if not only the evidence on this subject were condensed, but also the speeches. But, be that as it might, he could not see that either the case of the Archbishop of Armagh or of Mr. Flannagan could in any way be brought forward as charges against the grant to Maynooth College. The hon. Gentleman then quoted two passages from the evidence, and, as it was likely to give rise to delusion if from a mass of evidence extracts were taken, he would only refer to the witnesses which had been adduced by the hon. Gentleman, and he hoped to be able to show that those very witnesses had made statements adverse to the conclusion at which he had arrived. The hon. Gentleman had referred to an answer given by Mr. O'Hanlon as a proof of the recognition by the Roman Catholics of the temporal power of the Pope, but the hon. Gentleman had entirely lost sight of the answer given by the same witness to the previous question. The question was put—

"We teach in Maynooth, that the Pope has no temporal power whatever, direct or indirect. We have affirmed that doctrine upon our solemn oaths, and we firmly maintain it in the College of Maynooth. We hold the same doctrine in regard to the Church."

He should not have quoted from the evidence of Mr. O'Hanlon, had not the hon. Gentleman done so; but he (Mr. Horsman) thought, that when the hon. Gentleman quoted a long answer of Mr. O'Hanlon, in order to prove that the doctrine of the temporal power of the Pope was inculcated at Maynooth, he was justified in quoting a short answer in which that doctrine was most clearly and distinctly denied. He must confess that he had been rather surprised at the next question referred to by the hon. Gentleman which had been put to and answered by the Rev. Mr. O'Hanlon. The question was put—

"The Index is not received, and therefore imposes no obligation in this country. Dr. Murray, the late Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Doyle, and, as well as I can recollect, Dr. Curtis the Archbishop of Armagh, and Dr. Kelly, Archbishop of Tuam, declared, upon their oaths, in the House of Lords, in the year 1825, that neither the 'Bulla Oenam,' nor the Index, was received in Ireland, and I am sure they have not been received since that period. The Index, therefore, induces no obligation upon us; but, as clergymen belonging to an ecclesiastical institution, we feel ourselves constrained to defer to the expressed wishes of the Pope."

And from that answer the hon. Gentleman jumped to the conclusion that, because the College of Maynooth allowed the Pope to have a voice as to the books which were to be used in the college, the teachers of that college admitted his temporal power and his right to absolve British subjects from their allegiance to the Queen. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire was followed by the hon. and learned Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop), who seconded his Motion, though he hardly thought the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Spooner), could have derived much comfort from the way in which that was done. The hon. and learned Member for Greenock supported the repeal of the grant to Maynooth because he wanted to destroy the Established Church. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire said the Roman Catholics would destroy the Church unless we repealed this grant, while the hon. and learned Member for Greenock said, Maynooth was one of the strongest buttresses of the Established Church, and he wanted to destroy the buttress in order that he might the easier bring down the Church. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire appealed to the Dissenters, who, he said, would be placed under the supremacy of the Roman Catholics if this grant was not repealed, and called upon them to support the Established Church, under which so many privileges were enjoyed. The hon. and learned Member for Greenock, on the other hand, said they ought to join the Catholics of Ireland and assist them in bringing down the Established Church. Such was the congruity of sentiment that existed between the mover and the seconder of this motion. But the hon. and learned Member for Greenock also appealed to the evidence, though with great caution, and he likewise did not venture to say one word with respect to the Report. The hon. and learned Gentleman alluded to the opinions of the Rev. Mr. O'Hanlon as to the interference of priests in election matters; but he forgot that Mr. O'Hanlon had distinctly stated that he never taught any doctrine on the subject, his opinions being mere abstract opinions, without any authority whatever. He was asked—

"Do you teach the doctrine at Maynooth to prevent the priest acting in such a manner as to make it dubious whether he is acting in his ecclesiastical function or in his temporal or civil function?—So far as I am concerned, I have never taught any doctrine in Maynooth on the subject;

state of Maynooth College, and undertake to show that the teaching at Maynooth differed from that which was originally established, that its tendency was immoral, and that the establishment was a national pest. It was for the interest of charity and good will that he opposed this motion, because charity and good will were the precepts of religion in which he was brought up, and the more he venerated that religion, and the more he desired to uphold, elevate, and exalt it in the eyes of others, the more he wished to have it admired as the instrument of peace, instead of being detested as the emblem of injustice. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire had thought it necessary to make some observations with respect to the time at which he had brought forward this Motion, and he (Mr. Horsman) must also say, that the time he considered was most inappropriate. They now, for the first time they could remember in the history of Ireland, witnessed a degree of peace, prosperity, and tranquillity, such as they had never before beheld. After years of every kind of suffering and calamity a ray of sunshine had appeared in that country, which some years ago they could not anticipate. The peasantry were industrious, the proprietary were thriving, there was peace where there had been war, there was security where there had been danger, there was no political agitation, everything, as far as they could see, promised a future which it was impossible to look forward to without hope and satisfaction, and he felt it was unfortunate on such an occasion that these causes of dissension, discord, and strife should be raised, in connection with a question the most dangerous of all, because it was connected with the religious susceptibilities of the nation. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the safety of the Throne, the integrity of the empire, and the happiness of the Queen's subjects as being involved in this question, and he threw on the House the responsibility of rejecting it; but he (Mr. Horsman) said let the responsibility of bringing the subject forward fall upon the hon. Member. Let his be the honour and glory of sowing dissension and discord where peace now prevailed, and of raising all those questions which it had been the desire, the aim, and the effort of successive statesmen for years past to endeavour to set at rest. He (Mr. Horsman) and, he hoped also, the majority of that House, were prepared to take on themselves the responsibility of promoting that system of legislation which he thought had conduced to uphold the character of the Legislature and of the nation, and to vindicate and raise our national religion in times not without difficulty. He trusted, that in times of peace and prosperity to Ireland they would enjoy the fruits of having wisely and impartially administered the affairs of Ireland, and that they might be able to say of the Queen of England, that it was her glory in peace and her strength in war, that she reigned in the hearts and spoke with the voice of a well-governed and united people.

MR. NAPIER said, that as this question had been brought before the House, it was impossible for any hon. Member to avoid pronouncing a judgment and opinion on it. Though, as a member of the Established Church, he could not concur in the doctrines of the Roman Catholics, he was ready to argue this question as the right hon. Member the Secretary for Ireland had put it—simply as a political question. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the House was now called on to disendow what had been endowed under the peculiar circumstances of 1795. But the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would not touch the Act passed at that period, which did not endow at all, but was simply permissive, enabling the parties to receive subscriptions and donations for the voluntary support of the college. Subsequently, annual votes were passed as donations, but this Motion merely called upon the House of Commons to take into consideration the present endowment out of the Consolidated Fund, which was created by the Act of 1845. With respect to the priesthood of Ireland who were educated at that college, what had been the description given of them by the noble Lord opposite last year, when the Motion was made with respect to the Six-Mile Bridge affair? He admitted that if any clergyman in England had done half what the two priests then had done, the country would have been convulsed from John O'Groat's to Land's End; and, in answer to an hon. Gentleman, who naturally inquired why they were not prosecuted, the noble Lord said that, perhaps, they were not worse than any other of the priests in Ireland. What had been the further description given by Lord Clarendon in his celebrated letter to Lord Shrewsbury? It had been said that the Index Expurgatorius was not enforced in Ireland. If so, why had Bailly's book been expelled from the College of Maynooth? The evidence in 1825 and 1855 was not very consistent. With regard to the bull, In Cœna Domini, one witness is asked whether it was in

to protection as other denominations. They must look at this question as statesmen, and not as sectarians. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had said that no man in that House was more tolerant with respect to his Catholic fellow-subjects than himself. He (Mr. Horsman) must confess that in that case he hardly knew what was meant by the expression of "Protestant toleration of our Catholic fellow-subjects." They must remember that the population of these islands, the subjects of Queen Victoria, were divided in their religion; that in England the majority were Protestants, and in Ireland Catholics; if they took the population of the two islands, undoubtedly the majority would be of the Protestant faith, but if they took the population of the whole Christian world, they would find an immense majority of Catholics. How, then was the question to be settled, seeing that neither would defer to the arguments of the other party? Were the two parties to be drawn out against each other in perpetual hostility? That system had surely been tried long enough. Up to the year 1829, they tried all they could do by severity and proscription; since 1829 they had tried what they could effect by conciliation, and, as experience had shown, with the greatest possible success. Since 1829 they had attempted to adapt the legislation to the real condition of the country, and the attempt had been followed by the most important results. He could not see on what ground the grant to Maynooth was to be regarded as a matter of favour which the Government were entitled to withdraw at pleasure. Neither the number nor the character of the Irish people, who, after passing through a long period of adversity and distress, still remained the equals of Englishmen in all the qualities that stimulated ambition or commanded success, warranted such an inference. They were not the people so inferior either in number or qualities that we might condescend to "tolerate" them. He totally repudiated the word. The hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to draw a distinction between the population and the priesthood of Ireland. True, he had paid some compliments to the Catholic population, but he had qualified those compliments by strong censure, and, with regard to the priesthood, he (Mr. Horsman) felt that great injustice had been done them on account of their having taken part in political contests. Now, in estimating the character of the priesthood, it must not be forgotten that

Ireland had been for centuries torn by faction, that the religion of the people had been strenuously attacked, and that it was therefore natural that the priests should come forward to the van and be foremost in the battle. Besides that, circumstances had drawn the Irish people and the Irish priests into unusually close relations. To whom had the peasant had to look for centuries? They could not say that the landlord had been his friend. They had been estranged by the difference in their faith. Nor could it be said that the law had been his friend, for he had long known the law only by its privations and its proscriptions. Nor could he look to the Government as his friend; for the only experience he had had of its action was for a long period in its penalties and severities. In such times as these the peasant not unnaturally felt that the priest—sprung, be it remembered, from his own rank—was the only friend he had to look to. And he believed that in his efforts to promote the well-being of those committed to his charge, the Irish priest had done his duty conscientiously and assiduously. In all their trials, in all their difficulties, in all their dangers, there had existed the closest tie between the priest and the peasant, and he believed, whether acting right or wrong, it had always been the desire of the latter to promote, as much as possible, the welfare of the Irish population. He did not hesitate to say, that he sympathised with every faith that was the object of persecution, and with every man who was the victim of oppression. So far from thinking it was necessary to apologise for the course he had taken, it was for hon. Gentlemen opposite to apologise for the course they had taken. It was for those to apologise who had made Protestantism the cloak for injustice and the instrument of wrong, and who had exhibited it to the world in invidious features. It was for them to show that their practice was conformable to the principles of the religion they professed. Persecution had been a heavy blow and great discouragement to Protestantism in Ireland, and the more he venerated his religion the more he would elevate it by attending to those precepts of charity and justice on which he thought it was founded. Vindicating for himself the right of judgment, he would give that right freely to all who differed from him. It was in the interest of peace that he opposed this Motion, because he thought the religion he professed was the religion of peace.

Commission had been issued to ascertain whether, as a matter of State policy, that experiment had succeeded or had proved a failure. He thought that the result of the labours of that Commission showed, as far as the grant to Maynooth was concerned, the failure of the experiment. But, looking at the grant in another point of view, he could not help regarding it as an insult to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. It was, in fact, offering a bribe of 30,000*l.* a year to keep the Roman Catholic clergy quiet. He hoped the House would consent to go into Committee to consider the proposition of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire; but if, when it should be laid before them, it should appear to him that it could not be carried into effect consistently with justice, he should be the last man to give it his sanction.

On the Motion of Mr. Serjeant O'BRIEN,
Debate adjourned till Wednesday, 6th June.

MISSION TO VIENNA.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he would now beg to move the Address of which he had given notice for Returns of the expenses of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to his Lordship's mission to Vienna. He understood that the number of individuals attending upon the noble Lord upon his mission amounted to thirty-two—male and female. He certainly had never heard that it was the custom for ladies to be sent on foreign missions. He had no wish whatever to stint the noble Lord of anything which could conduce to his comfort, but the people, from whose pockets the money came, had a right to know what the cost of this mission was, the more especially as it had been a total failure. He hoped, therefore, that the whole expenses would be stated fairly and without concealment, whether they referred to luxuries, comforts, or recreation, or whether they were for purposes connected with the public service.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Returns of the Expenses of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to his Lordship's Mission to Vienna and Conference with the other Missionaries of France, Austria, and the Sublime Porte, thereto assembled for Negotiation and Treaty with Russia for the restoration of Peace."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could not agree to this Motion, the object

of which clearly was to cast an imputation on his noble Friend of which he was not deserving. [Colonel SIBTHORP: No, no!] The Motion was totally without precedent. If the hon. and gallant Colonel could state any reason why Parliament should inquire into the expenses of this mission, that would be a ground for departing from the usual course. The expenses of missions of this kind were always stated in the return of Civil Contingencies laid before the House, and a sum was usually taken to cover them in the Estimate for Civil Contingencies. His noble Friend had only just returned from his mission, and the accounts were not yet sent in, but, when they were sent in and presented in the return to Parliament in the usual way, he would undertake to say that they would be found to be in no way beyond the ordinary and usual amount of expenses of the same kind. It must be remembered that in the case of extraordinary missions such as this the bare expenses only were allowed, and no salary or emolument whatever was paid to the Minister or Ambassador performing the duties. The Motion could only be intended as a vote of censure upon the noble Lord; it was a total departure from precedent, for which no Parliamentary reason whatever had been assigned, and he should therefore not consent to the production of any such return.

COLONEL SIBTHORP said, he was convinced from the noble Viscount's refusal to grant this return that the Government were afraid to lay an account of the expense of this mission before the House. He would leave the public to draw their own inferences, but for his part he looked upon it as an underhand, low piece of business, and he washed his hand of it altogether.

EDUCATION (No. 2) BILL.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Mr. Speaker, when I applied for leave to introduce this Bill, of which I am now about to move

force in Ireland? He said it was not. On being asked why, he answered, because the Roman Catholic bishops examined in 1825 had said so. But did they? Dr. Doyle, in his examination, insinuated that the bull was not in force, that it had been rejected in every Christian country in Europe. He was asked, was it in force in 1793? He said it might have been and subsequently, but that it was not then in force. But what did Cardinal Erskine say to Sir John Cox Hippesley in 1793? He told him that it was in force in all cases where no impediment existed. Therefore, it was in force always in Ireland. But that bull was the standard of all the cases reserved to the Pope; and, moreover, it raised the most important question of all—what was the canon law adopted in Ireland? He (Mr. Napier) challenged any man to say authoritatively what the canon law was as it was in force in Ireland. The professors of Maynooth taught it without any restriction; but in a compilation of authentic references, to which the name of the Vice Chancellor of Cambridge was appended, he found that the canon law, as taught in Maynooth, was largely in conflict with the constitution of the country, and that it established in temporal matters the Pope's spiritual authority. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) said the Pope had no temporal power in these countries; but this volume showed that it was a supreme spiritual power in temporal things; and the Gallican Church, which understood the case better than the right hon. Gentleman, had taken the distinction between temporal power and power in temporal things. One of the witnesses was asked if the Pope had any power over conscience. He said, no, except it was a case of conscience? But, in the answer to the next question, he declared that the canon law was the rule of conscience, and no one would tell what the canon law was. The professor was examined as to the body of that law published by the Bishops in 1832, and asked whether the bull, In Cœna Domini, was reprinted in it. He said it was, but that his copy had been printed in Belgium. The Irish Roman Catholic Prelates had, however, given their sanction to its publication, and there were plenty of copies of it in Ireland. With respect to this grant to Maynooth, the Government and Parliament had got into a false position, and they must get out of it, whatever might be the consequence. Great importance was attached to the election of free students for Maynooth, but by whom were they elected? By Dr. Cullen, and the other ultramontane archbishops, who were appointed specially by the Pope. He was the Pope's legate, and was appointed the head of the Synod held in Ireland. The first thing he had to do in that capacity was to administer an oath to every member of the Synod, by which they were bound to obey the Pope and enforce the Canons. So that they had these men in effect swearing that they would carry out the canon law. He would appeal to the common sense of the House whether they would support an institution by means of which they would enable these men to spread ultramontanism and carry out the canon law, which was declared to be contrary to the laws of this country? It might be illegal to act according to the canon law, and might subject the transgressors to punishment. Why, then, he would ask, should they go on educating people in error, and allowing them to be taught to obey the canon law, and then afterwards punish them for doing so? Looking at the question as a matter of policy and of plain common sense, he would ask whether the Act of 1845 had turned out satisfactorily? He believed it had not, and that it was, therefore, well worth their while again to reconsider the subject. He could very well understand many persons saying—"We don't give this money for the purpose of teaching erroneous doctrines, but we give it to enable the Roman Catholic priesthood to get a better secular education, that they might be more qualified than they now are to minister to the Roman Catholic population of Ireland." The State policy of this measure of the Maynooth grant was first to get a domestic and well-educated priesthood, in order that the people might not be left in the hands of those who were not competent to teach them; and the next object was to have a loyal body of men attached to the constitution. But had they succeeded in these two objects? With regard to the first, the evidence showed how it had failed; and, in respect to the second object, he had shown that the students of Maynooth were taught to recognise the whole body of the canon law without check or control. He thought that Parliament was in such a false position that nothing could save them but a frank and searching review of the past, which should be done in such a way as would respect the rights of all parties. They had tried a great experiment. A tion, all I can say is this, that, disclaiming any such intention, I shall be prepared to meet them in the same candid spirit, and shall be willing to introduce words when in Committee upon the Bill, to guard against the apprehended danger. The reason why I do not think that I am open to this charge is, that the Bill rests upon what is commonly called the denominational system. I beg hon. Members to recollect, that I have, by the wording of my clauses, divided the schools of England, both present and prospective, into two great classes. The first is all the existing schools, some of which are good and some bad, but still a great number of them are at present in existence. The other great class is the schools to be hereafter provided under the clauses of the Bill. It seems to me that such is the intention of my measure, and in my humble judgment there is really a provision for religious instruction in both of these classes. It seems to me that all the existing schools throughout this country, as far as my knowledge goes, are connected either with the Church of England, or with some one of the great recognised religious denominations of this empire. And here let me speak of the Dissenters with that respect, and I will say with that gratitude, which I feel towards them. I hope, Sir, that in considering the provisions of this Bill, there will be no feeling of bitterness existing between Churchmen and Dissenters. It is, I think, impossible for the most ardent Churchman to deny that in the course of the last half century, while the population was increasing so vastly in numbers, the Church of England has failed to keep pace with the requirements of increasing numbers. On the other hand, it is equally impossible to deny, that in respect to both religious and secular knowledge we see growing up around us in crowded districts a population dangerously and sadly ignorant of the great truths of religion. But, dangerous as that evil is, it would be far greater had not the leading denominations of Dissenters stepped in to the rescue, and trained many thousands of our population to the knowledge of their religious duties, of which the inadequate supply of Church instruction had left them utterly ignorant. With these feelings of respect towards the Dissenters, I have framed my Bill, and with the belief that our great and well-known denominations of Dissenters—for it is to them I now speak—wherever they have their own schools established, will be as ready as any other religious classes to inculcate the necessity of reading and explaining the Holy Scriptures. It would, therefore, be almost presumptuous on my part, to prescribe to them the necessity of teaching the Scriptures in their schools. Well, what are the other existing denominational schools not in connection with the Dissenters? There is an immense number of them connected with the Church throughout the length and breadth of the land. My belief is, that if I could ward off the objection taken, and prescribe in my Bill the manner in which the clergy of the Church of England should read the Scriptures, and teach religion to the people, I should raise a storm against me of the opposite nature, and I should be asked what business had I to tell them how they are to read the Scriptures and to teach religion in the schools of this country. I only mention this branch of the subject for the purpose of showing that in omitting any direct allusion to the reading or teaching of the Holy Scriptures, I felt that by necessity, by the terms of the Bill itself, it was laid down that in respect to the schools of either class, although there was toleration for all, still that the new schools to be established under my measure must be in connection with some religious denomination. Well, then, another objection has been raised, that in respect to some of those new schools to be established under this Bill, there is nothing to prevent them being as it were Mormonised. I allude to this point now, because I perceive it has been raised in a petition presented this day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson), in which the very word "Mormonist" is mentioned. Well, my answer to this objection is this—I never contemplated, in the establishment of schools under one class or the other, that any other religious denomination should come within the provisions of the Bill, except such as are recognised and are well known; such as have followed the proceedings of the Committee of Council on Education. The provisions of my Bill only apply to the recognised religious denominations. Now, as the clause does require that the religion of those schools should be prescribed by the Committee of Council, it follows as a matter of course that the Committee of Council will not prescribe any religion for them that is not already recognised. Sir, having said so much in justification of this measure, I do not think it necessary to detain the House by any further explanations. An Amendment, I believe, will be moved to the second reading of this Bill. I shall then have the power of meeting any of the objections that may be urged in the course of this discussion. I have therefore now, Sir, merely to move that the Bill be read a second time.

MR. HENLEY: * Sir, I am sure the House will feel that no apology is required from my right hon. Friend for having brought forward this important subject. It is one in which all parties are deeply interested, and no apology is necessary on the part of any man for bringing forward any propositions which he may think calculated to promote the welfare of his fellow-creatures. Sir, I confess I feel very great difficulty in the course I am about to take, because, in asking the House not to agree to the second reading of a measure which professes to have for its object the promotion of the education of the people of this country, it might be assumed by some persons that I am inclined to oppose any extension of education at all. That, however, is not the case, and the reason why I feel called upon to oppose the Bill of my right hon. Friend is, that I entertain the most deliberate conviction that to affirm its principles will not be to extend education at all—certainly not religious education. Fortunately, I am relieved from the necessity of replying to any insinuation that, in opposing the Bill, I am actuated by a party feeling, because it is brought forward by a dear and valued friend, with whom I have been associated, and nothing but the conscientious conviction that it will produce the evils I apprehend could have induced me to oppose it. But, having this conviction, I think it is due not only to my right hon. Friend, but to myself and to the country, to state fairly the objections which I entertain to the measure. The new definition given to the principles of the Bill this night by my right hon. Friend does not in the least alter my opinion of the measure. I do not think that any one who has carefully read the Bill can misunderstand the intentions of my right hon. Friend; but whether my right hon. Friend has succeeded in carrying out those intentions in the enactment he has proposed is altogether a different question.

Sir, I am even disposed to look at this question in a somewhat higher point of view than my right hon. Friend has considered it. The professed object of the Bill is to bring a good and extended religious education within the reach of every door; but, instead of extending education, I believe the Bill will have a contrary effect. The real question for the decision of the House at the present moment is, whether it will extend and foster a voluntary self-supporting system of education, or whether it will run the great risk of suspending that system for three or four years, while a new scheme can be got into operation; whether, in point of fact, it will absolutely arrest the vast progress now being made, run the risk of cutting the throat of a system which, if it has not done all the good that can be wished, has unquestionably effected a vast amount of good, and set up a system of local or State education to be supported by an enormous taxation.

Sir, in bringing into operation the vast machinery proposed by the Bill of my right hon. Friend, I do not think the result will be attained which my right hon. Friend seems to expect; and one very serious question for consideration, which I shall have occasion to allude to hereafter, is, whether, in such a measure as this, you will not stamp upon the education of the country the brand of pauperism. That is not a matter to be lost sight of. At the present moment the humbler classes of society are contributing largely and cheerfully to aid in, and secure the education of their children, and are being gradually drawn more kindly towards their richer neighbours; and each class is endeavouring to contribute in fair proportion to the common good; and I should be most sorry to see anything done to interrupt the process now going on.

And, here, Sir, I will ask, what is meant by the word "education?" If it is meant that a person is merely to be able to read and write, do certain sums in arithmetic, or answer certain claptrap questions about the position of various parts of the world, the reigning sovereigns, and other matters of that kind, then I have no hesitation in saying that I do not very much value such an education. I believe, Sir, that education, to be of value, and especially that which it is the duty of the State to promote, ought to be of that kind which trains the mind upon the solid foundation of religious teaching, reaches the heart, and elevates the condition of the people, so that they may know what is, and how they are to do, their duty to God and man; and, doing their duty to God and man, may successfully struggle through this life to the life to come. Humble as may have been the means by which we have endeavoured to attain this end, I believe that among the people of England, compared with the population of any other country, a state of things has been brought about, which, if it may not be all that can be desired, shows, at all events in comparison with other places, that the system which has existed cannot have been so very faulty. A very large proportion of the favourable result that has been brought about must necessarily be attributed to the school system. My right hon. Friend may call the present system no school system at all, but an enormous number of schools are scattered over the face of the country, in which, though the education imparted may be deficient in what is commonly called school learning, the effect has been to secure the more important result of educating the minds and hearts of the people. My right hon. Friend has referred to the deficiencies as to numbers of the Church Establishment in affording auxiliary aid to the education of the people. No man can be more sensible of that fact than I am, and every one must admit that, short as has been the means of securing secular education, the means of securing spiritual education among the people, except in the schools, has been still shorter. It must, I think, be admitted, that if religious instruction is not secured in the schools, we shall deceive ourselves if we expect that it will be supplied either by the parents or the ministers of religion, the number of the latter being wholly inadequate for such a purpose. According to the official returns of the last Census, rather more than two-thirds of the number of children which Mr. Horace Mann estimated ought to be at school were at day schools, whereas, in reference to the religious point of the question, the deficiency in the number of those who ought to attend places of worship is much more. My right hon. Friend, in introducing his Bill, stated what he considered to be the requirements of the country, and placed those requirements under four heads. In order that no mistake may be made in the view taken by my right hon. Friend, I will give his statement from a published report of his speech. My right hon. Friend said—

"In considering this subject, I shall divide it into four parts—first, the number of those who receive no education at all; secondly, the quality of the education received by those who attend schools; thirdly, our comparative state with regard to the rest of the world; and fourthly, the deplorable results of having neglected this question."

Sir, I propose to follow my right hon. Friend into each of these points, and I may remark that the conclusion drawn from them by my right hon. Friend was, that the deplorable results of our neglect had surrounded us with a mass of ignorance and crime which was sapping our prosperity, and deeply affecting our welfare and our institutions. Now, Sir, I believe that there never was a time when the institutions of this country were more secure than they are at present, and when, speaking generally, we could look with greater satisfaction upon the state of the people. I do not wish to be misunderstood in this matter. I do not mean to say that there is not a large amount of crime and ignorance existing, which I should be glad to see removed; but ignorance and crime will always exist to a certain extent, though that is no reason why we should not take every means in our power to abate that ignorance and prevent that crime. Now, I hold a strong opinion that the measure proposed by my right hon. Friend will not remedy the deficiencies of the existing system, that it will neither increase the number of scholars, nor the quality of the education imparted. It must, however, be borne in mind, that when I use the term "quality of education," I mean that sort of education, as contra-distinguished from school learning, which while it instructs the head will reach the heart. My right hon. Friend, in introducing his Bill, drew an elaborate comparison between the state of education in this country and upon the Continent. I shall have occasion hereafter to touch upon that subject more fully, but at present I merely wish to say that, according to the evidence of the amount of crime prevailing in England, it is at all events decreasing, and my right hon. Friend has never attempted to show, in any part of his long and able speech, the connection that may exist between the want of school learning and crime. Sir, let it not be understood for a moment that I stand here as an advocate for ignorance, but after the observations of my right hon. Friend, it is necessary to see how far his arguments are supported by facts. In the first instance, I differ in some degree from my right hon. Friend as to the number of children at school. The statement of my right hon. Friend was, however, founded upon the Census returns, and, according to those returns, the number attending the day schools is about 2,140,000, and the number attending the Sunday schools, about 2,400,000. According to the calculations of Mr. Horace Mann, there ought to be something like 3,000,000 children at day schools, instead of 2,140,000; and the first question for the House to consider with regard to this statement is, what is the reason that the whole number of children who ought to be at school are not at school? In point of fact, that is a matter that lies at the root of the whole question; and any person who has gone at all closely into the question will have arrived at the conclusion, that the lack of attendance at school is not altogether owing to the want of school-room. The evidence taken before the Manchester and Salford Education Committee is almost conclusive upon that point; but while in the aggregate there is a sufficient amount of accommodation, there may be many local deficiencies. The provisions of the Bill, however, give no sure remedy for such a state of things. According to the Report of Mr. Watkins, one of the Government inspectors, on this subject, quoted by Mr. Horace Mann in his Report on the Census, it is said that—

"In 256 inspected schools, having 27,363 children in average attendance, the accommodation, at six square feet for each child, is available for 50,801. In Manchester and Salford it seems, from the evidence before the Parliamentary Committee of 1852, while only 38,663 children were upon the books of all the day schools, there was redundant accommodation for no less than 34,448; so that it may very fairly be concluded that if, in 1851, as many as 2,144,378 scholars were upon the books of day schools, the accommodation could not have been far from adequate for 3,000,000. It is possible, indeed, that the accommodation may not always have been just in the place where it was wanted."

Now, the great question for the consideration of the House is, the reason why these children do not avail themselves of the accommodation provided, and, with all due regard to the able mode in which Mr. Horace Mann has treated this question, I think that gentleman has, in dealing with it, omitted one most important element—namely, the distance at which many of the children live from the schools where education is to be obtained. Now, I am prepared to show that the Bill of my right hon. Friend, and all Bills of a similar character, would fail to bring the schools to the door of the children, and from their very nature would be unable to do so. The indifference of parents is often alleged as one cause of the small attendance at the present schools; but how is the right hon. Gentleman's Bill to remedy that evil? I am afraid that the indifference of the parents arises from a feeling that, it is not surprising to me, should have lingered among our humbler brethren for a much longer time than among the educated classes; for it is not many years ago that even in educated society there was not such universal agreement as to the benefits of education as you find now, and it is almost cruel to reflect, as has been done in many works relating to the subject of education, upon the indifference of the parents to send their children to school, when doubts as to the benefits to be derived from it have so recently existed in the minds of the educated classes themselves. From whatever cause the indifference of the people arises, the Bill provides no mode by which the attendance of the children can be made compulsory; and thus in respect to the indifference of parents, the number of children who will stay away from school will continue the same as at present. The next point is a most important one, namely, whether the want of attendance at school arises from the poverty of the parents. Poverty and indifference are matters entirely distinct from each other, and the argument that the poverty of the parents keeps the children from school divides itself into two distinct considerations—one being the inability of the parents to pay the school pence, and the other the want of thriftiness and careful habits among some of the poorer classes, by which, when they get a little behindhand in the world, though they may be enabled to pay the school pence, they are not able to send their children to school in sufficiently decent apparel to place them upon a footing with their neighbours, and are therefore induced to keep them at home from a feeling of false pride. I believe that that feeling exists to a very considerable extent, and no means are provided in the Bill by which it can be remedied. Certainly, so far as the limited class who are unable to pay the school pence are concerned, the Bill would afford some remedy, inasmuch as it proposes in certain cases to make the schools free. How far they are to be made free is a question of great importance, because, if the new schools only are to be free, the remedy would be of a very partial character, and to make all the other schools free would be to stamp pauperism upon the whole people, and to produce an evil which would be ten thousand times greater than any advantage to be derived from the possibility of bringing to school the few children whose parents are unable to pay the school pence. My right hon. Friend, in his able speech when introducing this Bill, selected Austria as one of the best educated countries in Europe; but I shall shortly have occasion to show that the compulsory and free-school system of Austria has not succeeded in bringing so large a number of the whole population into elementary schools as the voluntary system adopted in this country. The difficulty of getting the children to the schools lies at the very root of the present question; and a statement of Mr. Horace Mann goes to prove that it is not an inability to pay the school pence that keeps the children from school. Mr. Mann says—

"The condition of many of the free schools where no payment is demanded of the scholar seems to show that 'poverty' is not an adequate explanation of the children's absence, for in many free schools, though located in the midst of populous neighbourhoods, the attendance of scholars is less numerous and much less constant than in schools which require a fee. The fact that free schools, well conducted, may be found half empty, while a multitude of uninstructed children who might enter them remain outside, seems inconsistent with the theory that the poverty of the parents is the chief impediment to a sufficient school attendance."

That is the opinion of Mr. Horace Mann; but Mr. Mann does not stand alone. Mr. Kennedy, who favours a rate, one of the Government inspectors, as quoted by Mr. Baines, in his evidence before the Manchester and Salford Education Committee, says—

"And without some stimulus I almost fear that no measure, not even a rate providing good instruction for all, will have due effect; for, even when we have got good school-rooms and good teachers, and plenty of them, how are we to get the scholars?"

Mr. Kennedy offers no solution to this question, nor does the Bill of my right hon. Friend. It is, however, incumbent upon my right hon. Friend, in proposing a complete change of the present system, to show that the change would have the effect of inducing an increased number of children to attend the schools, though I believe my right hon. Friend must entirely fail to show that such would be the result. On the contrary, I believe, that, instead of the Bill securing the attendance of a larger number of children, there would be a danger of closing many of the smaller schools now existing, and consequently of diminishing the number of scholars, who could not attend the district schools.

I come now to the question of the quality of the education given. My right hon. Friend has made broad assertions, but has given extremely little evidence as to the bad quality of the education at present imparted; and he has been altogether silent as to the quality of the religious teaching given in the various schools. My right hon. Friend admitted the large number of schools now existing, but was not pleased with their locality, size, or the quality of education given in them. He said, "Your schools are scattered about all over the country, and held in all sorts of places." Now, the reason they are scattered all over the country is, that they have been established as the Church of England has followed the population. It is impossible in every little village of one, two, or three hundred inhabitants, to have fine schools, but those who think with me that it is highly requisite at all events to teach the child his duty to God and man, have been content to supply that education in those humble day schools in those corners, which my right hon. Friend does not approve, and by that means they have diffused throughout the length and breadth of the land such an amount of essential knowledge, which, although it comes short in the article of technical school learning, has been among the causes, under the blessing of God, of the present improved condition of the people. My right hon. Friend has not been quite just upon this point; he has quoted an extract from Mr. Mann's Report, containing a statement of a nature calculated to attract the attention of the House, without having given the whole of the statement made by Mr. Mann in reference to the subject. My right hon. Friend, after describing the manner in which the existing schools are scattered throughout the country, their humble character, and the places in which many of them are held, proceeded to say—

"Mr. Mann adds these significant words—'In the case of 708 out of these 13,879, the returns were respectively signed by the master or mistress

[Sir J. PAKINGTON: Hear, hear!] My right hon. Friend cheers, but in common justice to Mr. Mann another passage appended by Mr. Mann, which entirely qualifies the statement quoted by my right hon. Friend, ought to have been given. Mr. Mann said—

" Of course, in looking at the 13,879 inferior schools, it must not be forgotten what a large proportion of the total number of scholars is composed of children under five years old, for whom a higher class of school would be of little avail."

I think my right hon. Friend ought, in common justice, to have quoted that passage, because it completely removes the effect of Mr. Mann's previous statement. It is well known that children are sent to what are called "infant schools" at the age of one or two years; in fact, the labouring classes frequently send their children to such schools that they may be taken care of while the parents are at work, and all that is required on the part of the teacher is, that she shall be a good motherly woman who will keep order among her scholars and teach them their letters. I believe it would be found, on inquiry, that more than 700 out of the number of schools to which Mr. Mann referred were of the class of infant schools. The only other evidence adduced by my right hon. Friend with regard to the quality of the education afforded, was a quotation from some work which mentioned the number of men in a militia regiment who were unable to write their names, and were obliged to make their marks. The House must remember, however, that militiamen generally enter the service at the age of twenty, or even earlier, and, as the children of the poor usually leave school about the age of twelve, the reference of my right hon. Friend carries us back to the state of education as it was eight years ago. The case of these militiamen may afford some proof of the state of education eight years back, but it is no evidence of the state of education at the present time.

Sir, I must express my surprise that my right hon. Friend has omitted, throughout his speech, any notice whatever of Sunday-school education. The instruction afforded in such schools is unquestionably a very valuable element in the educational system of this country, and I believe tends not only to keep up the knowledge which has been acquired by children in day schools at an earlier age, but also to do much in imparting the most valuable of all knowledge.

My right hon. Friend has compared the systems of education in this and in foreign countries, and appears to rely principally upon the case of Austria. I shall endeavour to show the House what is the real value of that comparison. The right hon. Baronet, in introducing his Bill, said—

" I find that in 1846, when the population of England was 17,018,600, the number of persons committed for trial was 25,107, and the number summarily convicted was 35,749, making altogether 60,856 persons convicted of crime. The population of Austria in the year 1838 was 23,652,000, and the detected crimes amounted to 29,492. The result is, therefore, that while the population of Austria was upwards of 6,500,000 more than that of England, the detected crime in England was double that of Austria."

My right hon. Friend went on to state, "that in Austria one in 800 of the population was detected in crime, while in England three in 800 are detected, making a difference of three to one." It is with great regret that I feel compelled to say that my right hon. Friend's comparison is inaccurate in every particular. In the first place, the House will observe that my right hon. Friend's comparison is between persons accused in England and persons detected in Austria. In the next place, the right hon. Gentleman takes from the criminal tables for this country, relating solely to indictable offences, the number of persons as convicted, when, in point of fact, they were only accused, and, adding to them the number summarily convicted, he compares the result with a table of criminals in Austria which relates only to what are in England indictable offences. On referring to Mr. Kay's book, which is the authority upon which my right hon. Friend has relied, I find that the offences included in the Austrian table of criminals are not such as are treated summarily in this country. The list contains high treason, breaches of the peace, rebellion and outrage, public assaults as contradistinguished from common assaults, returning from transportation, ill-treatment of officials—(I do not know whether in this country such an offence is indictable or can be dealt with summarily.) The other offences mentioned are forgery, coining, religious disturbances, violation, murder, manslaughter, procuring abortion, child desertion, wounding, malicious burning, theft, embezzlement, robbery, fraud, bigamy, defamation, assisting criminals, and non-compliance with the sanitary laws. Surely no one will contend for a moment that the class of offences which come under our summary jurisdiction in this country, can have anything to do with such a table as this. Now, Sir, as the House has been told that Austria possesses one of the best educational systems in Europe—a national system which the people are compelled at the point of the bayonet to adopt—I have endeavoured to ascertain the real condition of that country in an educational point of view, so far as regards the numbers receiving education, and I will undertake to show the House, that, notwithstanding the existence of a national and compulsory system of education, the number of persons receiving education in Austria is below what it is in this country. This is a very material point in considering the comparative results of the voluntary and State systems of education. The difference is materially in favour of this country, and I will show the House that, even with respect to the equality of distribution of education, the Austrian dominions are in a much worse condition than England, and that there is in this country less of crime, and a higher standard of morality, than in Austria. The work of Dr. Kay, Education of the Poor in England and Europe, refers to the years 1837 and 1838, and we have in the library of the House returns of the number of persons educated in the Austrian dominions, following exactly the same divisions as Dr. Kay, for the year 1847; and the proportion of persons educated in 1847 does not appear to have differed materially from the proportions of 1837 and 1838; so that, practically, the thing was pretty well stationary in Austria between these two periods. The whole population of Austria, excluding Hungary, was, in 1838, 23,652,000. The number of persons receiving education in all the primary schools, including what were called the "repetition" schools, at that time, was 2,338,985, the proportion of the whole population educated under the compulsory system being one in ten and a fraction. In this country, however, where it is said that no system of education exists, the proportion of the people receiving education is one in eight and a fraction. With regard to the number of persons convicted of the crimes before mentioned in Austria, I find it is stated by Mr. Kay to be 29,492, or as nearly as possible 1 in 800 of the population, in 1838. I shall show presently that in this country it was 1 in 846 in 1851.

I now come, Sir, to the test of morality, which is by no means an unimportant one, as showing how far education has reached the hearts and affected the conduct of the people. I may state that Mr. Kay, in his work, does not enter into this part of the question; and I have obtained the information to which I am about to refer from the Parliamentary papers in the library. The number of births throughout the whole Austrian Empire in 1846 was 976,495; the illegitimate births numbered 100,528; so that the proportion of illegitimate births was one in nine and a fraction. I will now direct the attention of the House to the state of education in the different portions of the Austrian Empire, and I must here observe that the statements of my right hon. Friend may have led the House to infer that the least educated among the population of Austria are the most vicious. I will ask the House to consider the condition of the provinces of Galicia, and of Upper and Lower Austria, which are under the same law with regard to a national system of education; Upper and Lower Austria having the largest number of the population at school, and Galicia the least number, excepting two provinces of small population. The population of Galicia numbers 4,728,000, but only one in forty-eight receives education. It must then be clear that, in Galicia, education, even under a compulsory national system, cannot be brought as it were to every man's door: for if that were so, how is it that so small a proportion of the children attend school? Now, what is the number of criminals in Galicia, in proportion to the population? It is 1 in 1,570. Let the House mark how elements of this kind baffle calculation, and how dangerous it is to be led by such statements as have been made by my right hon. Friend to condemn our own system and our own population. Then, with respect to the question of morality, I find that the number of births in Galicia in the year 1846 was 200,742, while the number of illegitimate children was 17,271. In Galicia, therefore, where education is compulsory, yet reaches few of the people, there was one illegitimate child in eleven, while on the average population of the Austrian Empire the proportion was one in nine. I will now refer to the most highly educated part of the Austrian Empire—namely, Upper and Lower Austria, which contain 2,246,000 inhabitants, and where the proportion of the population receiving education is 95 or 96 per cent, or one in six and a fraction—an extraordinarily high proportion. The number of criminals in that portion of the Austrian dominions was 3,418, or 1 in 656 of the population. What, then, is the state of morality in the same districts? The number of births was 82,879, of which 20,000 were illegitimate—a proportion of about 1 in 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ . So much for the comparative results to be drawn from the effects of a national and compulsory system of education! I do not wish to conceal anything, and I must therefore remind the House, in considering this subject, that the morality of the Austrian people may be affected by the marriage laws of that country, which, I believe, throw difficulties in the way of the marriage of persons who are not educated up to a certain point. It is, however, a very remarkable fact, that in that portion of Austria where education is the most extensively diffused, the moral and criminal condition of the people appears to be the worst. Unquestionably, the number of marriages in the Austrian Empire is less, in proportion to the population, than the number of marriages in this country, and I think that may well be the case when illicit intercourse exists to such an extent as is shown by these returns. I will now show the House what is, in this respect, the condition of our own still happy country, which my right hon. Friend has described as steeped in crime and ignorance. In 1851, the population of this kingdom numbered 17,927,609, of whom 2,144,378 were educated, or a proportion of 1 in 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ . The number of criminals—of persons convicted, not accused—was 21,579, in 1851, or 1 in 826. I take the year 1851, as affording a more just and fair average than 1846, when the number of criminals was remarkably low. Then, with regard to the question of morality, I find that, according to the last return of the Registrar General for 1852, the number of births was 622,990; and the number of the illegitimate children was 42,491, or one in fourteen and a fraction. The moral condition of this country, therefore, presents a remarkable contrast to that of the highly educated provinces of Upper and Lower Austria, where one birth in four is illegitimate. I think the facts I have proved—that the proportion of the population receiving education in this country is larger than in Austria, that the amount of criminality is less, and that the moral condition of the people is better—will show the House that it will not be very wise hastily to adopt a change such as that suggested in our present system of education. I have referred to returns in the library in order to ascertain the moral condition of other States in which a national system of education exists, and I find that in Belgium, Bavaria, and Denmark the state of morality, as tested by the births of illegitimate children, was considerably below that of this country. My hon. Friend has made this comparison an important element in his case, and, as we have been thus invited to go into the subject, I think it right to press it upon the attention of the House.

My right hon. Friend has referred to the case of America, which has also been frequently quoted as affording a strong instance of the advantages of what is called a national system of education. I am sure my right hon. Friend—and I believe the House and the country—would not value any national system of education unless it fully secured the element of religious teaching; and, although my right hon. Friend has only touched in a general passing way upon the excellence of the system of education in America, we are not without evidence which is entitled to considerable weight with regard to the effect of the instruction afforded under the American system, so far as religion is concerned. My right hon. Friend stated, and no doubt firmly believes, that by the measure which he has submitted to the House he will introduce a religious system of education into this country. The opinions of some persons who have paid attention to the state of education in America tend to show that, judging from the result of American experience, my right hon. Friend may probably be mistaken as to the effect of his measure. I am aware that the right hon. Baronet contends for a religious system of education. [Sir J. PAKINGTON made an observation to Mr. Henley which was inaudible in the gallery.] My right hon. Friend says he condemns the religious system of America, and I will show the House that the educational system established in America has sunk down into a purely secular system, and has produced results which, in the opinion of those whose statements I will quote, are not of a very favourable character. I will trouble the House with an extract from the evidence of Mr. E. Baines before the Manchester and Salford Education Committee, of which I believe the right hon. Member for Droitwich was a Member. Mr. Baines said—

"I would wish to speak with great respect of the American schools as to their secular character; I would wish also to say that there is something exceedingly peculiar in those schools, as they profess to be what they are not; they pretend to be, as they were originally, schools for teaching religion, and yet the teaching of religion is almost altogether banished from them. It is distinctly so stated by the Hon. Horace Mann, in his tenth report on the schools of Massachusetts. He says, 'The policy of the State promotes not only secular, but religious instruction; yet in such a way as leaves to every individual the right of private judgment and the sacred freedom of conscience.'

"In the origin of those schools in Massachusetts, which was 210 years ago, namely, in 1642, the instruction enjoined by law was distinctively religious instruction, and so it continued for a great number of years. That was the origin of the school system of New England in the Puritan times, by those called the Pilgrim Fathers; but, at present, while it is nominally religious, I apprehend that there is almost no religious instruction given in the day schools of the United States at all."—[Q. 1928.]

Now, Sir, I consider that this statement of Mr. Baines is entitled to very considerable weight. Indeed, I think the name of that gentleman is sufficient to secure attention to any opinion he might express upon a subject with which no man is better acquainted. I fear that if the plan submitted to the House by my right hon. Friend were adopted, there would be a great risk of its slipping down into a purely secular system. My right hon. Friend proposes to promote religious education in such a way as to leave to every person "the right of private judgment and the sacred freedom of conscience;" and we are assured that a system established upon such a basis in America has degenerated into a purely secular system. I find that the opinion of a gentleman named Tremenheere, who is thoroughly acquainted with the educational system adopted in the United States, is also quoted by Mr. Baines. I am not acquainted with the position of Mr. Tremenheere, and therefore I am unable to form any estimate of the value of his evidence; but that gentleman stated that he had consulted a great number of clergymen and others, who considered that the system was loosening the hold of definite Christian principles upon the minds of the people. Dr. Edson expressed a distinct opinion that the American system, which was originally set up as a religious system, had slipped down into a system of mere secular instruction, and had been attended with results which cannot but be deeply deplored. I fear that, if the plan of my right hon. Friend should be adopted by Parliament, it would also lead to consequences which no one would more sincerely regret than the right hon. Baronet. For my part, I am not prepared to consent to the establishment of a system which I believe must inevitably become merely secular.

My right hon. Friend has referred to what he calls the deplorable consequences which result from the want of an educational system in this country, and the first witness to whose evidence the right hon. Baronet referred, was a gentleman named Ruddock, who was an inspector of workhouse schools. Here, again, my right hon. Friend has not fairly quoted Mr. Ruddock. He quotes him, to show that in a vast number of the schools he has gone into, the children were totally ignorant, not knowing even the name of our Saviour; but it would have been only just if my right hon. Friend had given the accompanying remark of Mr. Ruddock on the subject. The quotation he has given, goes to show the deplorable want of education that exists, and the result of it; but Mr. Ruddock, after referring to the deplorable state of education among these children, added—

"I do not find that these children are furnished solely by those parishes which are still lacking the means of affording elementary education. All alike, whether possessing very good or inferior schools, equally with those where none exist, send their quota of ignorance to the union workhouse. The most prolific warrens are the outlying portions of large country parishes, and, still more, the suburban quarters of towns."—[Report on Workhouse Schools, 1861.]

This remark goes to show that it is not so much the want of schools as the want of getting children to attend those schools that is matter of complaint, and that is a point upon which the Bill of my right hon. Friend would provide no remedy whatever. I hardly know whether my right hon. Friend brought forward Mr. Ruddock's statement as an illustration or as something from which we were to draw an inference. If it was to be used as an induction, then I feel bound to point out to the House the very narrow area which that gentleman's observations embraced. The whole number of children in connection with the workhouses which he had to deal with in one year was 6,750, and therefore the induction is a very narrow one, if it is worth anything at all. If it is an induction, it is too narrow; and if it is an illustration, it is exaggerated. The only other evidence my right hon. Friend adduced to show the bad results of our present system was some well-known extracts, which are almost stereotyped, from the reports of the Preston House of Correction and the gaol of the county of Worcester. I will not say these reports are exaggerated, for they are no doubt true as far as they go, but they are not to be depended on as representing the average state of instruction even among criminals, because they speak of those who are in utter ignorance as one-half of the prisoners in gaol, while the general returns show the proportion to be one-third, and that this number is decreasing; so that here again, if these instances are quoted for induction, they are not sound—they are narrow in amount; and, if quoted as illustrations, they are exaggerated.

Having now gone through nearly all the evidence which my right hon. Friend has brought forward in support of his case—though I am afraid I have troubled the House at too great length—I will now adduce, in opposition to my right hon. Friend's views, the opinions of a nobleman recently published, as to the actual state of our population with respect to this matter. No doubt it is the firm conviction of my right hon. Friend that we are in a worse state than we have been. That being so, he proposes this vast and sweeping alteration, and therefore it is my duty to meet that conviction by the opinion of a person equally eminent and entitled to weight, though not more so than my right hon. Friend. About a week ago, an address was published in the newspapers, on this subject, to the schoolmasters of a certain district of the country, by my Lord Ashburton, and here is his opinion of the state of the people. He says—

"We know that education has been spreading day by day; the present generation is better instructed, more civilised, more softened in manners, more amenable to just control, than any preceding generation within the period of our known history."

That is Lord Ashburton's deliberate opinion, stated when urging the schoolmasters of a particular district still further to go on with the good work in which they are engaged, and pointing out to them certain modes by which in his judgment they would be better able to reach the hearts of their scholars. The next matter to which I will refer is the great increase of education that has taken place (for we are not stationary in this respect), and I cannot but regard the increase as very remarkable. In 1818 the number of day scholars amounted to one in 17·25; in 1833, to one in 11·27; and in 1851, to one in 8·36. [Census Report.] There has also been a remarkable addition to the number of Sunday scholars—an addition the value of which cannot be too highly appreciated as a means of arresting the progress of crime. In 1818, the number of Sunday scholars was one in 24·40; in 1833, one in 9·28; and in 1851, one in 7·45. [Society's Reports, 1852, 1853.] This is a remarkable statement, and ought not to be lost sight of in the consideration of this question. I believe that in this country children go to work at an earlier age than in foreign countries with which a comparison as to education has been made, and therefore our Sunday-school education should have greater weight attached to it than is ordinarily the case in making these comparisons. It is, perhaps, not possible to obtain precise information as to the number of children who are day scholars as well as Sunday-scholars; but still it is a vast element in our system, and, in my belief, is producing an enormous amount of benefit, not only by the high morality which it imparts to the scholars, but by bringing in contact with each other the higher and lower ranks of society, knitting them together in the bonds of good-will and mutual esteem, in a manner and to a degree that is not likely to be secured in any other way. Having shown that education has increased and is increasing up to this point, I must observe that we know from the returns of some of the religious societies that its march is not at all likely to be stopped. I have returns from the National Society, showing that there are year by year added schools capable of containing between 20,000 and 30,000 scholars in union with that Society. No doubt the schools in union with this Society form only a portion of the whole number of Church schools, and if the latter are increasing in the same ratio as the schools in union, and if the increase goes on at all in the ratio of the last ten or twelve years, it must soon overtake any deficiency that may now exist; the schools also connected with other religious bodies I have no doubt are also fast increasing, although I have no documents in my possession that so plainly show it; and I believe that the deficiency, such as it is, will be supplied infinitely quicker than by the substitution of any measure like the present.

If this Bill were passed, the instant effect would be to arrest all voluntary effort. It would be stopped at once, and very likely the support now given to education would be withdrawn. Let the House look well at the condition of our population, to the actual state in which we are as compared with former years. My right hon. Friend has not touched upon that subject. He has drawn an invidious, and, as I have endeavoured to show, an unfounded distinction between this country and Austria, but he has not looked at the existing state of our people. It must not be supposed that I think there is no room for improvement. That is not my opinion. But I am ready to show that our population is in a state of steady improvement. If this is the case, and I believe it is, then it ought to form a very large element in the consideration of the question—aye or no—whether we should disturb a system that is producing such good results. There are three subjects on which we have public returns of a kind to enable us to form an opinion on the past and present condition of our population, namely, crime, drunkenness, and bastardy. I look upon the returns affecting drunkenness as showing, perhaps more than any other, the effect of education upon the people, because education is of no use if it does not produce reformation in this respect, and save men from falling into bad and debasing habits. Self-control is especially looked for as the result of education, and there is nothing in which self-control is more called for than to resist the greatest of all temptations to most men at some period of life—that of stimulating drinks. The social glass presents temptations more or less to most people, and perhaps there are few who have not partaken of it more freely than was desirable. It is a temptation that besets all classes, and therefore we have a right to look to it as a test when judging of the effects of education. Some years ago the late Mr. Hume moved for returns upon this subject from towns in England having above 10,000 inhabitants, thus giving a wide area and a large induction. I find that with a population in 1841 of 15,914,000 for the whole country—I give the population for the whole country, but the comparison would be stronger if the population of the towns was given, as the increase is greater in towns than in the country—in 104 towns there were apprehended in 1841, 75,268 persons for drunkenness; and in 1851, with a population of 17,927,000, 70,097, being an increase of 13 per cent in the population, and a decrease of six and a fraction per cent in the amount of drunkenness—in other words, if drunkenness and the population had gone on increasing in the same ratio, we should have had 85,052 persons apprehended in 1851 for drunkenness, whereas the result is a considerable gain on the side of sobriety. I will next take the criminal returns, where a similar result is exhibited. In the last criminal returns, which come down to 1853, the inspector commences his Report by stating that the population has increased 27 per cent in twenty years, while crime has only increased 20 per cent; so that if crime had increased in the same ratio with the population, instead of having 27,057 criminals accused in 1853, we should have had 28,505. Another element in the consideration of this question is the amount of bastardy. In 1845, seven years back, the number of illegitimate children amounted to seven and a small fraction per cent, and in 1852 to six and a large fraction per cent. The decrease is not great, but still it is in the right direction. It is proper also to observe under what circumstances these results have taken place. We have had during this time a great mitigation in the severity of our punishments, the criminal law having been very much relaxed. There has also been a very large increase of police force, so that there is every reason to believe that a greater proportion of crime is detected. We have no record of offences committed—the police may prevent some crime, but they probably detect a larger proportion. Then, with regard to bastardy, there is that in operation to which I beg to call the special attention of the President of the Poor Law Board, as it has a great effect in increasing the amount of bastardy that exists—I mean that unfortunate and unjust state of the law which compels a man to maintain children not his own, if he has married their mother. My right hon. Friend knows that this is a provision under the Poor Law; and I know within my own experience, in my own neighbourhood, many cases in which persons live on in sin, though the woman wants to marry, and the man would not be averse, but who nevertheless do not marry, because the man would have to support any children the woman might have had either by a former husband or by another person. The unhappy woman who has children cannot, in fact, get any man to take her as a wife from that cause alone, and the result is, that the Poor Law produces in this respect as large an amount of wickedness and sin as any other law in the world. There may be economic reasons for such a law, but it operates very unfortunately; it leads to a large amount of sin and wickedness, and is an element to be considered, in viewing the question of bastardy in this country, small in amount as that bastardy is compared with foreign countries, and which but for the state of the law would in my opinion be much less.

Sir, I have now gone over these three points; but there is an important view of this question that I think ought not to be lost sight of. It is not one on which I can give statistical returns, but it immediately concerns the comparison which has been drawn between this and other countries, and is within the knowledge of every one—I mean the effect of our system of education on the people, producing as it does a sense of responsibility, self-government, and social order. I know it may be said that education has nothing to do with this—that it was the nature of our people; what is it that makes the nature of a people but education? Throughout the length and breadth of this land we have never yet set up the Goddess of Reason. In our system of education we have, from the highest to the lowest, laid down the principle that “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.” That truth has descended to us, and in some shape or other it permeates the whole mass of the people. It is because this truth has been carried out in all our proceedings—though in many cases, perhaps, there has not been added to it much learning—it is because we have carried out this principle in our day as well as in our Sunday schools, I repeat that we principally owe that remarkable self-control, social order, and good conduct in trying circumstances, which distinguish our people in so remarkable a manner. I cannot here help reading a passage from the pen of Mr. Kay, only reminding the House that the opinion of Mr. Kay was published in 1846, and therefore without his having had the advantage of the experience of what has since taken place. Mr. Kay, speaking of Austria, observed—supplied; that they sighed not for a state of public liberty of which they had no knowledge; that the Government wisely prevented their minds from being inflamed by those blisters to society that roused the same classes of our countrymen into a fever of discontent and disaffection, the effects of which were now visible in Great Britain, and that beneath the extended rule of Austria were to be found some of the best and most contented peasantry in Europe.”

But that is not all. He gave also his opinions of our own country, observing, that,

“While at the General Peace every Protestant State on the Continent set to work to find the means of future advantage, in the development of the moral force of its people, England alone appeared in this respect to have misunderstood the genius of Protestantism; that with the worthiest and most enlightened aristocracy, and the most influential and enterprising middle class, her lower orders were, as a mass, the least instructed, the least civilised, of any other lower class in Europe.”

This is followed by tables, from which I have already shown that the population in Austria is more criminal and less educated, so far as numbers, than the population of our own country, which is said to be so much neglected. But if Mr. Kay had happened to write after what took place in the streets of Vienna and Berlin, and in the streets of many of the other towns of Germany, in and after 1848, he might have been led, perhaps, to doubt whether our humbler educational system did not lay down as good a foundation of human duty as that of any foreign country, when he compared what had taken place in those countries with what we have had the happiness to witness in our own. We ought not to overlook this as an element in the consideration of a question like the present. Nor is that all. It is vain to suppose that, amid the various circumstances and trials of human life we shall not, as a nation, fall upon times of ferment; and accordingly we have experienced such times. Our people have also been subjected to the most severe trials and privations. What was their conduct in that state of ferment and under those severe trials? In 1840 and 1841, the masses in the manufacturing districts were exposed to the most dreadful privations and sufferings, and those sufferings and privations were endured with a patience that it was impossible not to admire. In 1842, more prosperous times occurred; and serious disturbances took place. In some districts of the country all authority was relaxed. We do not in this country very much employ bayonets; and even at that period they were hardly required, for, though there was great effervescence among the people, there was hardly anything more. The people were left at that remarkable period almost entirely to themselves, yet there was an almost total absence of anything like violence to persons or property. There was great irritation among large bodies of the working classes, for they conceived that the mode of dealing with their wages had not been just. It might be said that all authority for a time was at an end, and in a great part of Lancashire and Yorkshire there was a general outbreak. I do not mean to say there was no violence, but it was so trifling as to be truly remarkable. Instead of destroying machinery, they contented themselves with taking the plugs out of the steam boilers, and did the least possible injury, having shown throughout the most singular patience under their sufferings, and a remarkable degree of self-control during the outbreak. Then, take another portion of our people—that which composes our army. We have had a portion of that army exposed to very great sufferings—sufferings of a nature that severely try the human mind, and put to the test the power of self-government and the influence of principle more than any other—that of severe sickness combined with severe privations. Yet all has been borne with patience and resignation, and the only feeling expressed has been anxiety to do their duty. I cannot well understand that a system is very bad which has produced such results. It has been condemned by my right hon. Friend, and it has been condemned by Mr. Kay; but I do not think they have shown evidence to bear out their case, while I think they have put in evidence which thoroughly contradicts their assertions. The relation of school education to crime is a subject of great interest; and it is important to trace the connection, if any there be, between them. Heretofore I am convinced the question has been treated in far too general a manner. While engaged in the consideration of the case attempted to be made in favour of this Bill, I stumbled upon some statistics connected with this particular point, which I trust the House will excuse me for now quoting, as I do so merely for the purpose of bringing them under the consideration of hon. Members interested in this question, in order that it may be studied in all its bearings. It appears that in the county of Lancaster, with a population of 2,031,236, the educational percentage was 10·6, and in the county of Middlesex, including, of course, a portion of the metropolis, with a population of 3,632,177, the educational percentage was exactly the same. In the former county, however, the average of crime was one in 586 of the population, while in Middlesex it was only one in 913. This is certainly a remarkable discrepancy. On the other hand, while in North Wales, where the education was 9 per cent, there was only one criminal in 1,202 of the whole population, in South Wales, where the educational percentage was 8·6, the average of crime was one in 903. In Hertfordshire, which is a highly educated county—14 per cent of the whole population being educated—the average of crime was high also, being one in 620. [Census Report—Criminal Returns, 1852.] These discrepancies are certainly deserving of the serious consideration of all persons interested in the problem of the connection between crime and education.

Sir, I have been compelled, by the evidence my right hon. Friend has brought forward to endeavour to support the case for a vast national scheme of education, to go so much at length into statistics relating to this and other countries. I regret it. I do not attach very much value to this kind of evidence, but I could not avoid doing as I have done, without leaving an advantage, sure to be used, of asserting that the case could not be met.

Having made these observations, I will now address myself to the provisions of the Bill before the House. My first objection to the Bill is, that, professing to be a permissive Bill, it is not so, and that it will impose new taxes upon the people without their consent. Then I object to the apparent connection between the Bill and the Poor Law machinery. However successful in an economical point of view the Poor Law system of relief may have been, no one will say that it is a popular system with the poor; and I believe that to work this measure with boards constructed like boards of guardians would render it unpopular and distasteful to the poor, and that the larger portion of the poor, who are now contributing of their own means for the purpose of educating their children, will feel that they are branded as paupers—a feeling that cannot but stand in the way of its wholesome operation. My next objection is, that assuming a national school system to be necessary, it is wrong to lay so much of the burden on the real property of the country. My right hon. Friend might say he did not do so; but I will endeavour to show how far this would be the effect of the Bill. The House is no doubt aware that my right hon. Friend proposes to take the power of taxation upon real property to the amount of 2,000,000*l.* annually. My right hon. Friend looks astonished, but sixpence in the pound on the real property of the country would produce over 2,000,000*l.* a year. Then, for every shilling expended from this source, he proposes that an equal amount should be contributed by Government. If 2,000,000*l.* was to be contributed by Government, it must be raised by means of taxes, and, assuming that it was raised by an income tax, at least one-half would come out of real property; so that here was 3,000,000*l.* a year to be paid by the real property of the country. We have complained lately that the real property of the country is overtaxed, and endeavours have been made to throw some of the local burdens upon the general revenue of the country; but my right hon. Friend proposes to lay a new burden upon them, of which I can see no end. Then my right hon. Friend takes the power of borrowing 40,000,000*l.* of money. [Laughter.] The right hon. Baronet laughs, probably because he might not think that sum would be necessary; but still we can only deal with the Bill before the House. I believe the whole annual amount would be wanted. This matter has been gone into by educational authorities; and it will be found that the average cost of the education of 3,000,000 children would not be less than 25*s.* a head; so that nearly 4,000,000*l.* would be expended on these schools. I have no doubt that, in many instances, what is proposed would be utterly inefficient. It would act, as the House will see in a moment, most unequally. For instance, in the rich London parishes, sixpence in the pound would produce more than was wanted; but in country parishes having a small acreage of poor land and a considerable population, sixpence in the pound might be insufficient to provide for education. Thus, in consequence of this anomaly, there might be a great deal more money than was wanted in one place for the purpose contemplated by this Bill, and scarcely any in another. I am obliged to argue this question now as if the assessment were to be parochial, because my right hon. Friend has given notice that he intends to do away with union rating in working this Bill, and I have no hesitation in saying, that what I have just stated would be the effect of this measure in many parishes in the country and in the smaller hamlets separately rated. That my opinion may be somewhat fortified in this matter, I will read a passage from Mr. Horace Mann, quoting Sir John Kay-Shuttleworth, as to expense. This is an important matter, because my right hon. Friend proposes to increase the quality of the education, and that cannot be done without increasing the expense. Mr. H. Mann says—

"It is not my purpose to form any estimate of the amount of work to be accomplished in order to obtain efficient schools for the 3,015,405 children whom I have supposed to be in a position to attend. Sir John Kay-Shuttleworth computes that to provide an education of the character contemplated by the Minutes of 1846 for 1,836,562 scholars in public schools of religious bodies would require a total annual sum of 2,890,845*l.* (exclusive of the cost of new school buildings), or an increase on the present annual expenditure of 1,844,265*l.*"

So that, if it would cost 2,890,845*l.* to educate 1,836,562 scholars,—to educate 3,000,000 children, at the same rate, would cost upwards of 4,700,000*l.*; and I do not presume my right hon. Friend proposes to give education of an inferior quality; and he himself has assumed a larger number of children to be educated than Mr. Horace Mann. This is altogether exclusive of the cost of new school buildings; so that I doubt if the taxing power proposed to be taken will prove sufficient.

Another objection which I entertain to this Bill—and it is an objection to the principle—is, that I altogether object to a rate of the sort proposed. I believe that it will just bring into existence a second—I was going to say curse, but I will not use that term—but a second evil of the same nature as that for which we have all for so many years been trying to find a remedy, namely, the evil of church rates. It will indeed be unfortunate if we should create another such element of vexation and heart-burning in every parish. Indeed, I believe that this proposed burden will give rise to an aggravated feeling of dissatisfaction in consequence of its being a new burden. Many persons will bear a burden long established by usage who will nevertheless resist as unjust one newly put on. I think I can show to the House that the working of this measure in places where there are to be found persons of different religious persuasions must be to affect the conscience of people at least just as much as the question of church rates does at present; and, if that be the case, the Bill will give rise to the same opposition and heart-burning, and even to more, on account of the newness of the imposition. This is another reason why I object to the principle of the Bill, for what I allude to is not a detail, which could be altered in Committee. I believe, also, that the Bill will be either wholly inoperative—and I am inclined to think that that will be the result—or that it will operate unjustly. We have had some experience to guide us on this subject, and I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baines) is in his place, for he will correct me if I am wrong in what I am about to state. My right hon. Friend (Sir J. Packington) proposes to constitute throughout the length and breadth of the land bodies analogous to the boards of guardians. Until 1846 we had boards of guardians in existence constituted precisely as these boards of guardians are proposed to be constituted, and they had the charge of the education of a large number of children who were in the workhouses. Now, I would ask, whether, while the guardians had to educate those children, and before the time when the State interfered to pay the expense of their education, the condition of the education in those workhouses was satisfactory. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that it was not. I do not express an opinion whether it is satisfactory now, but I believe that the great reason for giving the grant in 1846 for paying the expense of the workhouse schools was, on account of their unsatisfactory condition, and because the guardians did not provide proper education. If that were so, what security will there be that bodies constituted precisely in the same way will execute the duty imposed on them by this Bill better now than formerly? The number of years is not so great since the change was effected, and I do not fancy that the nature of the people is so very much altered.

I shall now proceed to examine the Bill in reference to its justice. My right hon. Friend has used strong terms in regard to what he thinks the unjust distribution of the public grants under the operation of the Committee of Privy Council; and has observed that, in point of fact, the rich parishes had got all the plums out of the pudding, and the poor parishes had got none. Now, I want to know in what manner the present Bill proposes to remedy that injustice which my right hon. Friend so strongly, and to a certain extent justly, dwelt on. Let it not be supposed, however, that I consider the Government altogether wrong in the principle on which it has administered those grants. The Government has had, among other things, this point to consider—how to distribute the money in the way to do the greatest amount of good; and under these circumstances it may have been considered that by distributing a very large proportion of the money in aid more good had been done than by giving a large grant to a place where no additional sum could be collected. My right hon. Friend complains of this as being a great injustice. No doubt it is an inequality, but whether under the circumstances it was unjust is a matter with respect to which people might differ in opinion. But how does my right hon. Friend propose to remedy the injustice? My right hon. Friend said that Bethnal Green and other places he had referred to had had no share of the funds which they had been taxed to furnish. Well, my right hon. Friend said to these places, "You have had no grant and you have no school, therefore I will not give you any money, but I will give you liberty to tax yourselves." That seems an odd way of curing the injustice, and I should have thought that the best mode of remedying that wrong would have been to give to the Government larger sums to distribute, in order to assist these poorer places. Now, in establishing schools, under the present Bill, in these poor districts, let the House consider how the measure will work. This is an important feature in reference to the justice of the measure. I think I am not wrong in assuming that in these large and poor districts the population is composed of persons of various religious opinions. Probably the large districts alluded to in this City are inhabited by members of the Church of England, by various Protestant Dissenters, by Roman Catholics, and in some neighbourhoods by Jews also. I do not apprehend that in such districts the Church of England people are likely to be found in a majority. Therefore the question will be referred to the Privy Council as to what kind of school should be set up. I do not envy the Privy Council the pleasure of deciding that question. But let us see how the Bill will work, supposing there is a Church of England majority, for that is a possible contingency. My right hon. Friend said he was for religious education, and that he has founded his Bill on that principle. Now, I hope that those persons who are about to be carried away by a mere name, will consider how this matter will work in a place where there is a naked majority of the Church of England. In that case the school committee, without any reference to the Privy Council, would establish a Church school, so called. To that school, then, the children of members of the Church of England, of Protestant Dissenters, of Roman Catholics, and of Jews will of right equally resort, though half the population may consist of the latter classes. But, resorting to the school, as my right hon. Friend says that there shall be no violation of conscience, they will consequently get no religious education; and yet this is called a system by which religious education is to be furnished, and this would appear to be the only mode of extending education in such places.

I will now put the case the other way, though I confess I do not know rightly how my right hon. Friend proposes to deal with the case of a district where the members of the Church of England might be in a minority compared with the whole of the remaining population, and where the larger number of that remainder was composed say of Roman Catholics. I take it, however, that under these circumstances it would be the duty of the Privy Council to establish a Roman Catholic school; and then I should like to know how that school, which is to be equally open also for the children of members of the Church of England, of Protestant Dissenters, and of Jews, can be said to afford religious education to all those various parties, who might together form, with their families, a majority of the whole population of the parish. I can understand the secular system of the hon. Member opposite; but when it is said that the present Bill will afford religious education to the people, I must say that it may be done so in name, but in name only. My right hon. Friend proposes in this Bill to bring existing schools into union, upon certain conditions, and one of the conditions is, that no religious instruction to which parents object, should be given in the schools so admitted into union. Yet it is said that this Bill is to provide education, and religious education, to those who cannot now get it. I wish to know how any Roman Catholic or Protestant Dissenter, sending his child to a Church of England school, in union, can procure there religious instruction for that child? Do you think that any one living in a parish where a school under this Bill is set up, wishing as most persons do a religious education for their children, and being taxed for an establishment from which their children derived no benefit of that sort, will pay the tax with pleasure? I repeat that, in my opinion, this will be just as great a source of heartburning as the church-rate now is. Take the above case of a Roman Catholic school being set up, supported by this common rate, in such a contingency is the feeling of the country such as to lead us to suppose that the rate will be pleasantly paid under such circumstances? I think not; and therefore, while the Bill must fail to give religious instruction, it will at the same time create a cause of great irritation and heartburning in this country. Every one will admit that many of the towns in the kingdom, having 4,000 or 5,000 or more inhabitants, enjoy the benefit at present of two schools, one being a national school for children belonging to the Church of England, the other a school of the British and Foreign Society for the children not belonging to the Church of England. How would the Bill work in such a case? The British school has no distinctive religious teaching, and the Church of England school has, and cannot depart from it, in most cases, without a breach of faith. The Bill proposes, if the Church of England school desire to take the benefit of the rate, to give power to the school committee to send into that school any child, at the wish of the parents, and to compel the authorities of the school to receive the child, and at the same time give to him no religious education. Such a provision would most unjustly place the managers of the school in a painful dilemma. They must either violate their consciences by giving up the principle of the teaching in the Church of England schools, or they must consent to be taxed without deriving any benefit from the impost. That is essentially unjust, and I conceive it to be a principle of this Bill, and I do not see how it can possibly be amended.

Moreover, I believe that it is utterly impossible for rate-supported schools and voluntary schools to coexist. On this point I will read the opinion of Sir John Kay-Shuttleworth, a man most capable of forming a judgment with respect to it (1853)—

"It would be difficult to conceive that any man of Parliamentary experience could gravely propose that local municipal boards should be invested with power to establish rate-supported schools in every parish, with whatever constitution, to the inevitable destruction of the schools of religious communions."

I do not mean to say what that statement is worth; but Sir John Kay-Shuttleworth is considered a great authority on this matter, and as that gentleman has made statements with respect to the expenditure required for a certain object, and with respect to the destruction of the schools of religious communions, it is right and fair to make use of them. In America, also, I have understood that the rate-supported schools have nearly extinguished the private schools. Therefore I conceive that one of the first effects of the Bill will be to knock down all existing schools, by drying up the sources of their income. Let the House consider how this will bear upon the small schools in the rural districts, where from twenty to thirty or forty boys and girls receive instruction. Under a great national system, such as the one proposed, these small schools would be swept away, and the new district schools will probably be so inconveniently situated that the children cannot go to them on account of the distance from their homes. Thus a much larger number of children will be left uneducated than at the present moment. My right hon. Friend has assumed that the Church schools, a great number of which are in connection more or less with religious societies, will accept the terms the Bill offers to go into union. In that respect my right hon. Friend is, no doubt, wholly in error; and so strongly does my right hon. Friend appear to feel this difficulty, that he has thought it necessary to introduce a most extraordinary clause into this Bill, which professes to have for its object to increase religion, and consequently morality, among the people. The clause to which I allude is one providing that persons committing breaches of trust shall not be amenable to the Court of Chancery for such conduct. That shows that the persons who framed the Bill found an obstacle in the way of their plan as to Church schools which they thus desired to remove. They tempt the managers of schools to join them by the offer of a large sum of money, and they say to them that, if their consciences were at all tender and shocked at committing a breach of the solemn engagements under which their schools were founded, they should at all events be relieved from all legal consequences by the effect of the clause I have referred to. I confess that it appears to me a very odd mode of increasing the morality of the people to propose a provision to enable persons to commit with impunity an immoral act. With regard to religious instruction, my right hon. Friend said he would introduce a clause, if the House thought fit, to secure the reading of the Bible; but I cannot relieve myself from the apprehension that the Bill is not framed to secure religious teaching, for it only says on that point that nothing must be taught to which any one objects. The provisions of the Bill are wholly negative. The Bill of my right hon. Friend wholly ignores the existence of the clergy, and in respect to the additional school accommodation which the Bill takes power to give, it does not follow the ordinary divisions of our country, namely, those of parishes; for the word parish was not found in the Bill, except where a parish formed a union itself. The additional schools proposed by the Bill are to be in districts. There is a reason, I fear, for that, not in my right hon. Friend's mind, but in the minds of the framers of the Bill. By taking a district, they sever the connection of the child with the minister of the parish; and no one particular minister of religion would have a superintendence or control in respect to the school. This may be an inadvertence, but I am obliged to deal with the Bill as I find it. I may be told that that could be amended in Committee, but I name it as showing how the Bill was expected to be worked. My right hon. Friend does not appear, in considering this subject, to have adverted sufficiently to a very important point—the power of extending evening schools. It is proposed only to aid evening schools if there shall be a surplus revenue; so, at least, I understand the Bill. In the rural districts, the system of evening schools has secured the best results. In the agricultural districts, the children who go to work in the daytime have, during the long dark nights of winter, every opportunity afforded them of obtaining instruction in the evening schools. I know from my own experience that the young lads anxiously avail themselves of the advantage of these schools, and the parents express their gratitude for the means thus afforded for the instruction of their children. Thus the danger of the children wholly forgetting the instruction they have previously acquired—and this is a great evil to be guarded against—is to a considerable extent obviated. That I believe to be one of the most effectual means, with our Sunday schools, of meeting this difficulty.

My right hon. Friend has touched incidentally upon the subject of training masters, and here I agree with him that we have probably fallen into the error of attempting to train our masters too highly all at once. That has been a capital mistake, in consequence of which the large sums spent on their education have not been so beneficial as they might have been. I do not despair of attaining ultimately a high pitch of training and teaching, but I am afraid that, hitherto, we have attempted to get at it by too sudden a jump. In dealing with this subject, it must not be forgotten that the children to be educated are, generally speaking, the offspring of parents who have had little, if any, education, and it would be a dangerous experiment to attempt suddenly to raise children to a great elevation above their parents in this respect. If this were done by means of young men highly educated, who would not attempt to get at the hearts of their scholars, but whose main object would be to impart secular knowledge, without at the same time securing that sound religious basis which is to give the scholars their future springs of action, there would be great risk of the children being brought to look down upon their parents, and the result of such a state of things upon the morals and conduct of the nation would be far too disastrous to be compensated by the attainment of a little higher quality of school learning. This point is deserving of the most serious consideration. At present, I am informed that some of the highly trained schoolmasters who have been sent into the agricultural districts, complain that, owing to the early age at which their scholars are taken from them, they have no opportunity of bringing into play those branches of learning which they themselves have acquired at the cost of so much time and labour,—in fact, that they are actually rusting for want of employment. Thus they become dissatisfied, and dissatisfied people never can get that hold of the minds and hearts of the children they have to instruct, by which alone a schoolmaster can expect to secure a successful and lasting result to his labours. I am not altogether without hope that, considering the progress we have made and are now making, we may soon overtake and completely satisfy the educational requirements of the age. I hope, too, that the greater number of training schools now established throughout the country will imperceptibly improve the quality of the education. [Mr. CAYLEY reminded the right hon. Gentleman that he had not fulfilled his promise of commenting on the compulsory character of the Bill.] I am glad my hon. Friend has reminded me of my omission. The Bill, as I understand it, is to be worked by union machinery, each parish electing a guardian. I shall not be far wrong in saying, that there would be, on an average, from twenty to forty guardians in each union, besides a number of official guardians, not spread over the whole union, but coming all, perhaps, from one particular locality. Now, these guardians are not to tax themselves as a body, but each particular parish in the union, where they shall think education deficient; and thus any parish may have the Bill forced upon it by the board, having itself only an infinitesimal voice—the fortieth part of the whole—in the matter. It is in this way that I think the Bill may be described as being compulsory.

Before I conclude, I will, with the permission of the House, read a passage from a Report on Workhouse Schools, by Mr. Browne, which entirely expresses my opinion on the question of education:—

"In the education, necessarily elementary, of those who have to earn their bread by the labour of their hands, there is some danger that the moral training may give place to the merely useful, that more attention may be paid to that kind of knowledge which is directly convertible into money than to that which fits the individual to do his duty as a man in the future struggle, and, as we hope, the victory of life."

I believe the Bill of my right hon. Friend to be dangerous in this particular respect. I implore the House to consider what they are now asked to do. In the matter of education, of course, it is impossible to know the effect of a particular measure until eight, ten, twelve, or even fourteen or more years after; and a false step, therefore, must be of very serious importance. Persons of my age cannot expect to see much of the results of any new experiment, but those who come after may find, from the results, to their dismay, that, instead of having had an educational system based on sound religious principles,—such as that which has raised the character of the people of this country so high,

we have delivered to them a system which, like that of America, though intended to be religious, has become secular. I beg the House seriously to reflect before incurring such a risk. I beg them seriously to reflect before giving their sanction to any system not based on sound religious teaching, and which does not by that means inculcate the great truth, that all our powers, all our energies, and all our talents are given us to be used for the benefit of our fellow-creatures, and to enable us to perform faithfully those duties which God has imposed on us. Such an education is more likely than any other to promote secular knowledge among the people, because it would teach the child the duty founded on the highest obligation to make use of every opportunity of exercising every faculty and improving every talent entrusted to him, and for which he would have to render an account. But if, on the contrary, secular teaching should be made the first or only object of education, or we should be unwise enough to adopt a system, religious in name alone, but sure ere long to become purely secular, we should be venturing on an experiment which has failed wherever it has been tried, and we should be going contrary to the direct command of God, who has pointed out to us in the clearest manner, from Genesis to Revelation, that "Life is not to be obtained through the tree of knowledge."

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE said, he rose to second the Amendment of his right hon. Friend who had just sat down. But that, after the admirable and elaborate speech which the House had just heard, he should content himself with a very few observations. He gave the right hon. Member for Droitwich the fullest credit for having been actuated by the purest and highest motives in bringing forward this measure. It appeared, however, to him that the measure before the House was fraught with all the evils so eloquently described by his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), and he could not see how the doctrine of the Church and the teaching of her schools was to be separated, or how the religious education was to be kept apart from the secular. The experiment had been tried in America, and had failed signally, and he trusted that warning would be taken from the result of that experiment. Now in America there was no national Church, but this measure proposed to dethrone the Church of England from her office of teacher of this nation. He objected also to the whole machinery of this Bill. He objected also to the mode in which the Bill proposed to select the persons who were to discharge the office of instructors. It appeared to him that the Bill provided no other qualification for the choosers of schoolmasters than that of their being ratepayers. There was no function more sacred or more important, and it was not to be disposed of in the same way that a guardian or a constable was chosen. He must also object to the mode in which the election was to be conducted by means of a poll, with an appeal to the Privy Council on certain disputed points. He was one who would promote really sound education to the utmost of his power, but he must take the liberty of opposing the modes now proposed, for he was satisfied that they would not promote either good secular or sound religious education, but a result somewhere described by Lord Burleigh in one of his letters as a "mingle-mangle." It would almost infallibly generate a scepticism on religious matters, which he was sure the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) would be the first to oppose and to condemn. Let the House remember the opinion of an authority second perhaps to none upon questions of this description, of one of the greatest luminaries of his age and country, Lord Bacon. In his masterpiece, On the Advancement of Learning he had quoted the saying—

Emolliit mores nec sinit, easse feros.*"

But he immediately added this pregnant warning "mind you lay the accent on fideliter." He (Mr. Phillimore) opposed this Bill because it did not lay the accent on fideliter. It pretended, indeed, to unite religious and secular teaching, but the union was a wretched concubinage, not an honest marriage, and the offspring would be spurious.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. MILES said, it was with great diffidence that he ventured to express an objection to the able and argumentative speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). He regretted that his right hon. Friend had thought it necessary to set himself so decidedly in opposition to the principle of the Bill, more especially as he believed that the deductions which his right hon. Friend had drawn were essentially fallacious. No power on earth could have induced him to support the Bill had he not been of opinion that it was based on a religious principle. It was certainly to be lamented that a private Member should have to undertake the responsibility of bringing in a Bill of this description, but it had been forced upon his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington) by the delay of the Government, and that some Bill on the subject was asked for by public opinion was pretty evident, he thought, from the fact that the House had now three Bills—the Government, the Opposition, and the secular Bills—before them. Notwithstanding the great accession made to the educational means of the country by the denominational system, the question to be considered was whether the present means of education furnished by voluntary efforts were sufficient for the educational requirements of the country? If they were, the necessity for any Bill on the subject was entirely done away with; but if they were not, then that House was bound seriously to consider in what manner the additional facilities required could be supplied without trenching on existing schools. This was exactly the principle on which the Bill of his right hon. Friend proceeded. On looking at the state of education in different parts of the country, and on comparing it with the state of education abroad, no one could doubt, he thought, for a moment that something was required to promote the extension of education among our own people, and that the whole subject was deserving of the serious consideration of the House. To begin with foreign countries—in Prussia, Saxony, Switzerland, Baden, Wurtemberg, and Denmark one in six of the population were under education; in Sweden and Norway, in three provinces of Holland, and five departments of France, one in six and a half were under education; in Bavaria, one in seven, in Austria, one in nine, and, in Belgium, one in ten. In most of the northern states of the United States the proportion was one in six, in the rest, one in seven; while, with regard to the southern states, it was one in eight in Maryland, one in eight and a half in Virginia, one in nine in Delaware, and one in ten in North Carolina. Coming home to our own country, it would be found that the want of educational facilities was not so great in the agricultural as in the manufacturing districts. In what was called the York district the proportion of the population under education was one in six and a half, while in the manufacturing district it was one in eleven and a half. In ten of our largest manufacturing towns, containing a population of 913,217 persons, the proportion was one in eleven and three-quarters, while in ten other smaller towns, it was one in 6·95. How, then, was the existing deficiency to be supplied? There were two modes of doing this—the one by an education rate, and the other by a rate combined with grants from the Privy Council; and this Bill adopted, and wisely so, he considered, the latter alternative. With respect to the deficiency of education, he would refer to the evidence of the Inspectors of Schools, particularly as regarded the western districts. Mr. Kennedy reported—

"It is almost impossible to speak too strongly of the insufficiency of the majority of those schools. The school-rooms themselves are, for the most part, tolerably good, though possibly larger than is necessary for the daily scholars. But, generally speaking, the teachers, books, apparatus, and income of the school—the root of all the evil—is very insufficient."

Mr. Tinling, inspector of schools in Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall, stated—

"An acquaintance by personal inspection with the smaller schools convinces me that some additional public assistance is required to raise in them the standard of education, if the teaching of the great mass of the population is ever to be effected."

Having always supported a system of education based on religion, he felt that the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire had been rather unjust toward those who had always supported such a system, when he said that if they adopted this Bill they must look to see secular schools established in which there would be no religious teaching. Again, what was the evidence adduced before the Committee on Education in Manchester and Salford? It was decisive as to the necessity of providing some other funds besides those obtained by voluntary subscription for educational purposes. The different religious bodies in Manchester appeared to be in the habit of making fitful and spasmodic efforts in the work of education, exerting themselves actively when any Government scheme inconsistent with their own views was mooted, but afterwards relapsing into comparative apathy when the measure they apprehended was abandoned. The Dean of Manchester in his evidence stated that the falling off in the subscriptions and donations to the Manchester Education Society was as follows :—

The number of schools assisted was forty-five out of ninety-seven, and how, he would ask, was it possible to afford any adequate assistance to forty-five schools with only an income of 210*l.* The Rev. Mr. M'Kerrrow stated that he considered the voluntary system to be inadequate to meet the educational necessities of the community, and that the efforts made by voluntaryism in Manchester and Salford had in a great measure been abortive. He further gave the following evidence—

"The two societies connected with this part are the Congregational Board of Education and the Voluntary School Association. It seems to be necessary to have every now and then some party agitation, or kind of public excitement, like that produced by the Factory Bill, or the minutes in Council, to stimulate voluntaryism into some kind of spasmodic action. The Congregational Board of Education, at its annual meeting in May, 1846, reported that the sums ascertained to have been actually paid or pledged, and in the course of payment, by Congregationalists, towards day schools since 1843, amounted to 109,286*l.*, or above 25,000*l.* a year. But small indeed have been the sums contributed since the excitement to opposition to Government measures has passed away, and I very much fear that, if the prospect of the introduction of a national measure of education, demanded so extensively by the people, were to be removed, the voluntary effort which has again been somewhat stimulated would be still further diminished. From the balance sheet of the Congregational Board of Education, presented on the 10th of May, 1850, we learn that the gross receipts of the Board for the year preceding amounted to 173*4l. 14s. 10d.*, and its disbursements to 144*1l. 15s. 7d.*"

The Congregationalist body in Manchester made similarly fluctuating and inadequate efforts to promote education, and one of the witnesses stated that it was necessary periodically to get up the excitement of opposition to some threatened State educational measure in order to stimulate voluntary subscriptions among them. The Rev. John Kershaw, a Roman Catholic clergyman in Manchester, also stated that the voluntary system had hitherto proved inadequate for the education of the poor children of his denomination, who were often left to grow up in ignorance; and that gentleman estimated the number in Manchester that required instruction at 18,000, though at the present time there was only school accommodation for 4,000. Such was the evidence adduced before the Manchester and Salford Committee by witnesses belonging to different denominations with respect to the voluntary system, and however much the Members of that Committee differed, and they did differ with respect to the means of education which ought to be employed, every one of them, he believed, with the single exception of Mr. Peto, left the Committee room with the conviction that voluntary efforts had proved inefficient, and that it was necessary to come upon Government with a call for further funds for the promotion of education throughout England. The great cry of all the inspectors, and the burden of all the evidence taken, agreed in saying that the great deficiency was in the funds, and that the voluntary system had failed in supplying that deficiency. He would ask hon. Members whether the denominational bodies in the poorer districts, having prepared and got ready their schools, would not be willing to put them under the Bill of the right hon. Baronet, and the consequence would be that they would each have their own denominational teaching with perfect liberty of conscience; that was to say, if any father, mother, or guardian objected to the doctrines taught in any school, their children would have a right to be absent during the time of that teaching. Without that liberty he felt convinced that they could never form a system of national education which would meet with the concurrence of the people of England. The Bill proposed to make the Bible the essential basis of the education given in the schools, and, with that as the foundation of all their teaching in morals and religion, no doubt the existing machinery would be gradually brought within the scope of the measure; and the House might therefore safely dismiss all those fears about its necessarily leading to an unmixed secular system which the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire had conjured up. That right hon. Gentleman took the total number of children now at school, and, adding 970,000 more, to get one-sixth of the whole population, he made an aggregate of 3,000,000 scholars, whose education, he said, would impose a charge of 3,000,000*l.* per annum on the real property of the country. Now, if no private individual would henceforward subscribe a farthing towards the cause of education, and if the National Society, and all the other religious bodies, immediately retired from the field on the passing of this Bill, the right hon. Gentleman's apprehensions and calculations might be well-founded; but it was clear that the Church societies would not suspend their labours; they would still desire to have a school in every parish, and the clergy, who in the poorer districts were now often called upon to contribute more than their means would allow, would gladly hail the assistance they would receive under this Bill, whether in the shape of a rate or a grant. The right hon. Gentleman's notion, that the Bill would entail an annual burden of 3,000,000*l.* on real property, was therefore a mere fantasy. Allusion had been made to the reading of the Bible in the public schools of the United States of America, but it should be borne in mind that the United States' schools were not, and never had been, denominational, whereas ours always had possessed that character. In America, the Bible was used in schools sometimes to inculcate doctrines, sometimes to teach morals, and at other times merely for reading lessons, or for its sacred history and geography; but in this country the circumstance that the schools were denominational afforded a guarantee that the education they gave would be religious. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire talked of a debtor and creditor account in relation to this question, but did he forget that crime cost the country 2,000,000*l.* annually, and pauperism another 5,000,000*l.*, or that the result of a better system of education, in checking both of those evils and reducing their expense, must form a very considerable "set off" against the debit side of the account? The religious difficulty incident to all such legislation was, no doubt, great, but it ought to be fairly grappled with; and the country was now ripe for the settlement of this question. There were, at the present time, three Bills before the House relating to it, and it was to be hoped they would all be read a second time and referred to a Committee up-stairs, in order that by some possible amalgamation of their most useful provisions a comprehensive measure might be framed that was likely to become law. In conclusion, he begged to repeat what he had formerly stated, that he never could support any system of national education that was not founded on a religious basis; and such he believed also to be the strong feeling of the country.

MR. DILLWYN said, he believed that if a general system of education could be devised, which was not based upon sectarian principles, it would tend very much to improve the condition of the people. He believed that the great majority of the moneyed classes in that part of the country with which he was connected (South Wales) belonged to the Church of England, and supported the Church schools; but the education given in those schools was not acceptable to the population generally. He could not vote in favour of this Bill, because in his district it would have the effect of converting all those parishes where religious parties were nearly balanced into arenas of political strife; while, on the other hand, it would leave large numbers of children, whether connected with the Church or with the Dissenters, without any education whatever. Indeed, this was to a great extent the case in South Wales at present, not from any indifference to the cause of education on the part of the population, but solely on account of their religious distinctions.

MR. BYNG said, he should support the Bill in no spirit of opposition to the masterly argument of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire, but because he entertained a sincere conviction that it would go far towards promoting the cause of education. It was based upon the principle of imposing local taxation for local educational purposes, and since it placed the management of the schools in the hands of the ratepayers and the local authorities, it also recognised the salutary principle of local self-government. He would candidly admit, that the progress of education owed much to voluntary efforts; but while he granted that any compulsory system in England would be at once dangerous and hostile to the feelings of the great body of the community, he yet could not concede that State interference in the matter of education was either impolitic or uncalled for. The State made laws for punishing crime, and surely it was not beyond its province to vote money for preventing it. The State was bound to govern the people, and it should also be bound to educate them as far as it could. Let him take that opportunity of saying one word as to the nature of the education provided by this Bill. With regard, then, to the secular portion of it, he did not think any exception could be taken to it, while he thought the clause which rendered it optional for a child to attend the religious teachings of the schools had been framed in a liberal and enlightened spirit. He should rejoice much if a system could be devised so as to unite all religious denominations, and at the same time combine religious with secular education; but, in the absence of such a scheme, it would not only be a waste of time, but excluding very many children from the benefit of secular education, to attempt to enforce any one particular creed. Besides, he could not help feeling that a parent who allowed his child to be educated in secular matters would not be unmindful of the advantages of religious instruction, and therefore, although it might not be obtained in the schools, it would be sought for elsewhere. The clause, then, to which he was more especially adverted, could be safely adopted without in any way proving detrimental to religion; and he should vote for it all the more readily because it recognised the great, the generous principle, of freedom of conscience in religious matters. He could have wished, however, that the Bill had gone a step further, and provided some means of education for adults, for it was just possible that the instruction obtained in early life might be forgotten as the child grew up into manhood; but perhaps the present was not the proper time for discussing that point, and he would not pursue it further. With the exception of some of the details, which he should object to in Committee, he generally approved of the scope and tendency of the Bill, which he believed would prove to be the first important step towards supplying those wants and omissions which were daily becoming more recognised in our system of public education.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that as there were several Ministers unavoidably absent, who he knew were anxious to give their opinions upon the Bill, he should move that the debate be now adjourned.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that, in the necessary absence of Her Majesty's Ministers at a Cabinet Council, he quite concurred in the opinion that it was advisable the debate should be adjourned. He was anxious, however—considering the deep interest which had been manifested with reference to the settlement of the great question of national education both by that House and the country—that the discussion in which they were engaged should not be adjourned to a more distant day than was absolutely necessary. It was extremely difficult for an independent Member to fix any day for resuming the discussion, but the course which he thought it would be most convenient to adopt was to adjourn the debate until to-morrow; meantime he might be enabled to make such arrangements with the Government as would place it in his power to name an early day for proceeding with the discussion. He must also be permitted to observe, that, while he was perfectly ready to admit the fairness of the tone and spirit of the very able speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), and that it was to him most painful to differ from his right hon. Friend upon any question of great national interest, he should be prepared, when the debate was resumed, to make to the objections which had been urged by his right hon. Friend against the Bill, what he believed would be a satisfactory and conclusive reply.

MR. COWPER said, that his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies had remained in the House during a considerable part of the debate, and that, having come to the conclusion that it could not terminate before six o'clock, he had had less hesitation in absenting himself than would otherwise have been the case. To-morrow arrangements might be made for fixing a day for the renewal of the discussion.

SPIRITS (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. KEOGH said, that, with a view of meeting the objections of several hon. Members, he proposed, when the Bill was committed, to introduce into it certain clauses giving power to appeal under its operation from the decision of the magistrates to that of the assistant barristers.

VISCOUNT BERNARD said, that many magistrates of Ireland had urged to him to protest most strongly against the passing of the Bill now before the House, and he must express a hope that Her Majesty's Government, in introducing the proposed Amendments, would in no way interfere with the practical working of the measure of last year, which had done incalculable good in the way of diminishing drunkenness.

The House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.
